District Court Upheld in Sentencing Defendant to Life Imprisonment for Attempted Rape and to 100 Years for Burglary Under Persistent Felony Offender Statute: The Supreme Court held that a proper interpretation of sentencing statutes allowed a District Court to mix and match a persistent felony offender sentence with another felony conviction occurring in the same proceeding and exceed the 100-year limit for imprisonment. State v. Gunderson, 2010 MT 166, 357 Mont. 142, 237 P.3d 74, overruling State v. Gaither, 2009 MT 391, 353 Mont. 344, 220 P.3d 640, that held that a persistent felony offender could not be sentenced to a term of imprisonment greater than 100 years.

100-Year Sentence for Persistent Felony Offender Replaces Sentence for the Underlying Felony: The Supreme Court overruled its previous decisions that the 100-year sentence for a persistent felony offender could be added to the sentence for the underlying felony and held that the 100-year sentence replaced the underlying sentence and that a District Court could sentence an offender to the maximum sentence on each charge. State v. Gunderson, 2010 MT 166, 357 Mont. 142, 237 P.3d 74, overruling State v. Gunderson, 282 Mont. 183, 936 P.2d 804 (1997), State v. Robinson, 2008 MT 34, 341 Mont. 300, 177 P.3d 488, and State v. Gaither, 2009 MT 391, 353 Mont. 344, 220 P.3d 640.

Persistent Felony Offender Sentence Limited to 100 Years: Gaither received an 85-year sentence for felony attempted sexual abuse of children, 10 years for felony criminal endangerment, and an additional 50 years with 10 years suspended as a persistent felony offender, for a total of 135 years in prison. Gaither appealed the sentence on grounds that the maximum sentence that could be imposed as a persistent felony offender is 100 years. The state contended that the sentence available under 46-18-502 could be applied to specific crimes in order to augment the overall sentence available for a defendant being sentenced for more than one felony. The Supreme Court interpreted 46-18-502 as mandatory, so that once a District Court decides to sentence an offender as a persistent felony offender, the sentence must be from 10 to not more than 100 years. The statute does not give a District Court authority to mix and match a persistent felony offender sentence with another felony conviction occurring in the same proceeding and exceed the 100-year limit on imprisonment. Because Gaither's sentence exceeded the 100-year limitation, it was illegal, so the case was remanded for resentencing, and if the state sought to sentence Gaither as a persistent felony offender, the prison sentence could not exceed 100 years. St. v. Gaither, 2009 MT 391, 353 M 344, 220 P3d 640 (2009).

Alternative Sentence for Drug Offense Not Precluded by Persistent Felony Offender Statutes, but Incarceration Not Error: Brendal pleaded guilty to fraudulently obtaining dangerous drugs and was sentenced to 25 years in prison with 15 years suspended. Based on prior convictions for the same offense, the sentencing court designated Brendal as a persistent felony offender and imposed a mandatory 10-year prison sentence. Brendal appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court should have considered a sentence to a drug treatment program pursuant to the alternative sentencing authority in 45-9-202. However, the Supreme Court affirmed. The persistent felony offender statutes do not preclude a District Court from providing an alternative sentence under 45-9-202 for a person convicted of a drug-related offense, as long as the required criteria for imposing an alternative sentence are satisfied. Therefore, although the District Court could have provided an alternative sentence, it was not error to sentence Brendal to incarceration. St. v. Brendal, 2009 MT 236, 351 M 395, 213 P3d 448 (2009). See also St. v. Hinshaw, 2018 MT 49, 390 Mont. 372, 414 P.3d 271.

Consideration of Sentencing Factors in Sentencing Persistent Felony Offender Not Violative of Right to Trial by Jury: Following conviction for an eighth DUI, Vaughn was sentenced as a persistent felony offender to a 50-year term in the state prison. Relying on the proposition in Blakely v. Wash., 542 US 296 (2004), that factual findings that serve to enhance a sentence beyond the statutory maximum must be determined by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt, Vaughn appealed the felony sentence, asserting that the 50-year sentence imposed under this section served to enhance the sentence beyond the maximum 13-month commitment to the Department of Corrections followed by a suspended sentence of up to 5 years authorized for felony DUI in 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) and that therefore the persistent felony offender sentence should have been determined by a jury on the facts. The Supreme Court first noted that the Blakely proposition applies to a fact other than the fact of a prior conviction and that it is the fact of a defendant's prior felony conviction that authorizes an enhanced sentence under 46-18-501 (now repealed) and this section. Here, Vaughn's enhanced felony DUI sentence was based on the sentencing court's finding that Vaughn had a prior felony DUI conviction. That factual determination may properly be made by the sentencing court rather than by a jury. The prior DUI was a sentencing factor that was an aggravating or mitigating circumstance supporting the imposition of a sentence within the range authorized for a persistent felony offender. Thus, Vaughn's right to a trial by jury was not violated by the sentencing court's findings of fact in support of a sentence as a persistent felony offender. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Vaughn, 2007 MT 164, 338 M 97, 164 P3d 873 (2007). See also Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000).

Suspension of Sentence Following Probation Violation Not Violative of Double Jeopardy — Credit for Time Served Properly Allowed: DeWitt was convicted of two counts of aggravated burglary, found to be a persistent felony offender, and sentenced to three consecutive 10-year sentences. DeWitt appealed, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to dismiss one count. While awaiting resentencing, DeWitt was incarcerated for 1,275 days. The District Court then resentenced DeWitt to one 10-year sentence for aggravated burglary and a consecutive 10-year sentence as a persistent felony offender, suspended all but 1,275 days of the 20-year sentence, and gave DeWitt credit for 1,275 days served. Without prison time to serve, DeWitt was immediately released on probation. DeWitt subsequently violated probation, the suspended sentence was revoked, and DeWitt was sentenced to 10 years with 5 years suspended, with credit for 160 days served while awaiting revocation proceedings. DeWitt appealed on grounds that the sentencing court failed to allow credit for the 1,275 days served when the suspended sentence was revoked and the new 10-year sentence was imposed and asserted that his double jeopardy rights were violated by reinstatement of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. When the sentencing court sentenced DeWitt following the probation violation, the court had a 16.5-year suspended sentence to work with, which was more than sufficient to account for the 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended that was imposed. Although a sentencing court must give credit for time served, revocation of a suspended sentence based on a probation violation and reinstatement of the original sentence does not constitute double jeopardy as long as the sentence is within the parameters of the sentence imposed in the initial suspended sentence and credit is allowed for time served. Further, a persistent felony offender designation is not a separate crime carrying a separate sentence, but rather is a statutorily required sentence enhancement that is part of the initial sentence, so the sentencing court could not have "dropped" the persistent felony offender count and sentenced DeWitt only under the aggravated burglary count, thereby limiting the available time on resentencing to 6.5 years. The sentence was not violative of double jeopardy, was within statutory parameters, and was affirmed. St. v. DeWitt, 2006 MT 302, 334 M 474, 149 P3d 549 (2006).

Constitutionality of Persistent Felony Offender Statutes: Shults contended that the persistent felony offender (PFO) statutes were unconstitutional on their face in violation of double jeopardy, equal protection, and cruel and unusual punishment or as they applied to Shults's case. The Supreme Court disagreed. First, the PFO statutes do not constitute double jeopardy because a sentence as a habitual criminal is not viewed as a new jeopardy (see Gryger v. Burke, 334 US 728 (1948)). Second, Shults was not able to show that the PFO statutes classify two or more similarly situated groups in an unequal manner and thus failed to meet the first threshold of a meritorious equal protection claim. Last, a sentence that is within maximum statutory guidelines and that is not so disproportionate as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community is not considered cruel and unusual punishment. Shults's sentence was within statutory parameters, and in light of Shults's 18-year criminal history and repeated failure to conform his behavior to societal norms despite having numerous opportunities to do so, the sentence could not be seen as so disproportionate as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community and thus was not considered cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 M 130, 136 P3d 507 (2006).

Failure to Raise Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Consideration Barred: Osborne was convicted of a fourth DUI in 1999, and when charged with felony DUI in 2003, the state sought to have Osborne declared a persistent felony offender. The District Court obliged, and Osborne was declared a persistent felony offender and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 5 years suspended. Osborne did not appeal the sentence directly, but filed a petition for postconviction relief, asserting that the sentence was not legal. The petition was denied, and Osborne appealed. The state argued that the Supreme Court was procedurally barred under 46-21-105 from considering the petition because the legal challenge to the sentence could have been raised on direct appeal. Osborne asserted that because the state did not raise the procedural bar issue in District Court, that argument was waived. Although the Supreme Court as a rule does not consider issues raised for the first time on appeal, this general rule does not preclude consideration of jurisdictional questions raised for the first time on appeal. The procedural bar is jurisdictional, so the court considered the state's argument, concluding that lack of subject matter jurisdiction may not be waived and that 46-21-105 represents a jurisdictional limit on courts' ability to entertain and decide petitions for postconviction relief and effectively prohibits courts from exercising jurisdiction over grounds for relief that could have been raised on direct appeal. Thus, Osborne's failure to challenge the legality of the sentence on direct appeal precluded consideration in a postconviction petition. St. v. Osborne, 2005 MT 264, 329 M 95, 124 P3d 1085 (2005).

District Court Jurisdiction to Apply Persistent Felony Offender Designation to Felony DUI: Yorek pleaded guilty to and was sentenced on a felony DUI charge. The District Court determined that it had jurisdiction and imposed a persistent felony offender designation. Yorek sought postconviction relief on grounds that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to impose a persistent felony offender designation for felony DUI. The District Court denied the petition for postconviction relief, concluding that sentencing for felony DUI is not solely governed by 61-8-731 and 61-8-734 (both sections now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10), that nothing in the persistent felony offender statute excludes felony DUI offenders from its application, and that Yorek waived any jurisdiction claim by pleading guilty. The Supreme Court affirmed. Nothing in this section distinguishes between or among the types of felonies to which it applies, or excludes DUI offenders. Rather, if the underlying charge meets the definition of a felony and if the state has provided proper notice of its intent to seek persistent felony offender status under 46-13-108, a District Court has the statutory authority to designate and sentence an offender as a persistent felony offender. Yorek's crime met the definition of a felony, and Yorek fell squarely within the persistent felony offender statute. The state met the notice provisions, and the District Court possessed subject matter jurisdiction to designate Yorek as a persistent felony offender. Because the jurisdiction question was dispositive, the Supreme Court did not reach the question of whether Yorek's guilty plea was a procedural bar against bringing the claim. St. v. Yorek, 2002 MT 74, 309 M 238, 45 P3d 872 (2002), followed in St. v. Pettijohn, 2002 MT 75, 309 M 244, 45 P3d 870 (2002), and St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005).

Failure to Adequately Inform Defendant of Maximum Possible Penalty — Reversible Error in Failing to Allow Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: After offering an Alford plea but prior to a change of plea hearing, Melone signed an acknowledgment of waiver of rights, stating that he understood the maximum possible penalty for felony assault and that his sentence could be enhanced for using a deadly weapon and because of his prior criminal record. At the change of plea hearing, the court informed Melone that the weapon enhancement penalty would not apply and that the maximum penalty for felony assault was "ten years in the Montana State Prison or a $50,000 fine". The court then allowed Melone to withdraw his guilty plea and enter the Alford plea. The court later sentenced Melone to 10 years in prison, plus 10 years to be served consecutively as a persistent offender. Melone moved for a hearing on the persistent offender enhancement and requested that he be allowed to withdraw his plea. The court rejected the motion to withdraw the plea, but vacated the sentence and granted a new sentencing hearing to allow Melone to present evidence regarding applicability of the persistent offender enhancement. Following the hearing, the court affirmed its original sentence. Melone appealed, contending that he was never informed that he could receive up to 100 years because of his potential status as a persistent offender and that, as a consequence, his plea was not knowing and voluntary. The Supreme Court agreed. Under 46-12-210 and 46-16-105, a defendant must be informed of the maximum penalty, including the effect of any penalty enhancement provision. The fact that the prosecutor informed Melone of a possible persistent offender penalty immediately prior to questioning did not satisfy the statutory requirement that the court inform the defendant of the maximum penalty. Melone's statements in the written acknowledgment were insufficient to satisfy the doubts of the Supreme Court that Melone was aware that his sentence could be enhanced by up to 100 years as a result of his plea. Rather, it appeared that Melone was under the mistaken belief that he risked sentence enhancement only if he proceeded to trial. Resolving their doubt that the plea was voluntary in favor of Melone, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case to District Court to allow Melone to withdraw the plea. St. v. Melone, 2000 MT 118, 299 M 442, 2 P3d 233, 57 St. Rep. 493 (2000).

Sentence of 100 Years Without Parole for Sexual Intercourse Without Consent Committed Upon Person of Same Gender Not Excessive — Persistent Felony Offender: Ford contended that his sentence of 100 years without parole eligibility for sexual intercourse without consent committed upon a person of the same gender was excessively harsh and disproportionate to the gravity of the crime. The Supreme Court found that the sentence was within legal parameters provided by statute and affirmed the sentence, noting that Ford: (1) was a persistent felony offender; (2) had a prior criminal history of sexually preying on young boys; (3) had undergone previous attempts by professional therapists and state officials to treat his problems but was apparently unwilling to accept the provided treatment; and (4) had a predatory nature. St. v. Ford, 278 M 353, 926 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 947 (1996).

Notice of Intent to Seek Increased Punishment Not Filed With Court Until After Trial — No Error in Persistent Felony Offender Designation: The state timely served defense counsel with notice of its intent to seek increased punishment for McQuiston as a persistent felony offender but did not file the notice with the court until after trial was concluded, 5 months before sentencing. McQuiston contended that timely filing of the notice was a jurisdictional prerequisite and that failure to so do constituted reversible error. However, the state's notice to defense counsel 5 months before trial and to the court 5 months before sentencing did not prejudice McQuiston, and the persistent felony offender designation was not made in error. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Determinative of Sentence Rather Than Statute Governing Underlying Offense: On March 13, 1995, the District Court sentenced McQuiston in open court to 15 years in the state prison, with 5 years suspended, for sexual intercourse without consent and 15 years in the state prison, with 5 years suspended, for incest. On March 14, the court entered written judgment sentencing McQuiston to two consecutive terms of 30 years in the state prison, with the last 5 years suspended, for each offense and further designated McQuiston a persistent felony offender and a dangerous offender. On March 31, the court, after review of the transcript of the sentencing hearing, amended the sentence to 22½ years in prison, with 5 years suspended, for each offense and ordered the sentences to be served consecutively for a total of 45 years in prison, with 10 years suspended. McQuiston alleged error in sentencing, arguing that the sentence constituted an ex post facto violation because it was based on the incest penalty in effect at the time of sentencing rather than the penalty in effect at the time that the offense occurred. However, when a defendant has been designated a persistent felony offender, it is this section that determines the maximum sentence, not the statute governing the underlying offense. The 22½-year sentence was well within the maximum allowed under this section, was not applied ex post facto, and was thus affirmed. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Maximum Statutory Sentence for Persistent Felony Offender — Not Additional Sentence: After finding Fitzpatrick to be a persistent felony offender, the District Court sentenced him to 10 years for escape and 5 years for burglary, plus an additional 100 years on each count as a persistent felony offender. The sentence imposed by this section is a maximum sentence, replacing the maximum sentence for the offense, and is not a sentence in addition to the sentence for the offense. Therefore, the Supreme Court vacated the sentences as being in excess of statutory maximums and remanded for resentencing consistent with this section. The sentences may not exceed 100 years on each count and must run consecutively. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 247 M 206, 805 P2d 584, 48 St. Rep. 164 (1991), replacing a prior opinion at 48 St. Rep. 5 (1991), followed in St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202, 52 St. Rep. 1019 (1995), and distinguished in St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997), and St. v. Robinson, 2008 MT 34, 341 M 300, 177 P3d 488 (2008), in which persistent felony offender sentences imposed in addition to sentences for the original offenses were not considered illegal because the total sentences imposed were below the maximum provided for by subsection (2) of this section and were thus within statutory parameters. State v. Gunderson, 282 Mont. 183, 936 P.2d 804, (1997), and State v. Robinson, 2008 MT 34, 341 Mont. 300, 177 P.3d 488, were overruled by State v. Gunderson, 2010 MT 166, 357 Mont. 142, 237 P.3d 74.

Second Felony Arising as Result of First Felony — Persistent Offender Designation Proper — Crimes Sufficiently Disparate: Defendant was arrested on a felony drug charge and later assaulted an officer while attempting to escape. Defendant asserted that the District Court erred in designating him a persistent felony offender because both underlying convictions arose from a single transaction. However, the fact that both crimes arose out of the same transaction does not in itself bar application of the persistent felony offender designation. In general, when different crimes, even though unrelated in nature, are committed at the same place, on the same victim or group of victims, and at the same time or as part of a continuous series of criminal acts, they should be considered as having been committed on the same occasion for sentence enhancement purposes. In this case, the crimes were sufficiently disparate in time, place, and victim that they could not be said to have occurred on the same occasion, so sentence enhancement was appropriate. St. v. Hawkins, 239 M 404, 781 P2d 259, 46 St. Rep. 1786 (1989).

Defendant Not Designated Persistent Felony Offender in Previous Conviction — Discretion of Judge Within Statutory Limits: Defendant argued that because he was not designated a persistent felony offender in his previous conviction, he should have received only 5 years under 46-18-502(1) rather than 50 years with 40 years suspended under 46-18-502(2). However, the sentence was within the range authorized by this section, and the judge did not abuse his discretion in imposing the sentence when the defendant could have been designated a persistent felony offender at the time of his previous conviction, based on his record at that time. St. v. Tracy, 233 M 529, 761 P2d 398, 45 St. Rep. 1705 (1988).

Rules of Evidence Inapplicable to Sentencing: Defendant contended that the court erred in adding 10 years to his sentence for being a persistent felony offender because the court relied on evidence improperly before it. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence because the rules of evidence do not apply to sentencing and because the evidence was competent. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988). See also St. v. Passwater, 2015 MT 159, 379 Mont. 372, 351 P.3d 382, holding that the rules of evidence do not apply to an award of restitution as a part of sentencing.

Three Hundred-Year Prison Sentence of Mentally Ill Defendant Upheld: Sentencing defendant, who was found mentally ill but criminally culpable, to the Montana State Prison for a term of 300 years without the possibility of parole or furlough was not cruel and unusual punishment. The District Court had stated, among other things, that defendant was very dangerous and there was no treatment program that would alter his behavior. St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984).

Defendant Under Duty to Contest Presentence Report in Lower Court: After conviction of theft and robbery, defendant was designated as a persistent felony offender and his sentence was enhanced. Defendant contended that there was no evidence that he was the same person whose prior record was introduced at the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court, relying on St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979), held that the defendant has an affirmative duty to contest matters contained in a presentence report. He chose not to and is precluded from doing so on appeal. St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983), distinguished in St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999).

Finding of No Mitigating Factors Supported in Record — Alcohol and Sexual Problems: Where the trial court considered defendant's drinking and sexual problems but concluded that those conditions did not excuse defendant from accountability for his acts, and the evidence presented at the hearing and in the presentence investigation report supported the trial court's conclusion, there was no abuse of discretion in sentencing defendant as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Sentence Under Persistent Offender Statute Not Cruel and Unusual — Fairness Questions for Sentence Review Board: A sentence of 100 years is within the maximum allowable by the persistent felony offender statute, and as such does not violate the eighth amendment to the United States Constitution. Challenges to the equitability of a sentence as opposed to its legality are properly directed to the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Specific Objection to Evidence Required in Persistent Felony Offender Hearing: By failing to make a specific objection, the defendant waived his right to assert that the State's certificate of prior conviction was not competent evidence without proof that he was the person named in the certificate. The defendant was informed well in advance of the time he entered his guilty plea that he would be tried as a persistent felony offender. At the hearing to determine whether the defendant was a persistent felony offender, he had an opportunity to object to the State's lack of identification but failed to do so. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979). See also St. v. Brown, 228 M 209, 741 P2d 428, 44 St. Rep. 1462 (1987).

Presumption of Constitutionality: Following a conviction for attempted deliberate homicide, the defendant was sentenced as a persistent felony offender to 30 years in prison without parole. While the defendant claims the sentence to be unconstitutional, it was held in St. v. Karathanos, 158 M 461, 493 P2d 326 (1972), that a sentence within statutory limits is presumed to be constitutional. The defendant has the burden of overcoming the presumption and has not done so. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

Persistent Felony Offender Versus Law-Abiding Citizen: Article II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., grants an offender who has served his sentence a fair opportunity to enjoy the rights that law-abiding citizens enjoy. It does not grant him immunity from being treated as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978). See St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Presentence Investigation: Although the State proved the defendant's status as a persistent felony offender by means of a prior felony conviction pending appeal, the need for a presentence investigation report was not thereby eliminated. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978).

Statutes Construed Together: The Supreme Court saw no problem in construing 46-18-502 and 46-18-503 (renumbered 46-13-108) together to provide both the procedural requirements and substantive basis for implementing persistent felony offender sanctions since that is precisely what the Legislature intended. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978).

Misuse of Plea Bargaining Process and Habitual Criminal Statute: Without declaring the plea bargaining process constitutionally infirm or the habitual criminal statute unconstitutional on its face, the Supreme Court held that the defendant was denied due process under federal and state provisions when he realistically was sentenced to 10 years for attempted burglary and 40 years for refusing to plead guilty and insisting upon a jury trial. St. v. Sather, 172 M 428, 564 P2d 1306 (1977).

Sentence for Prior Conviction: A judgment under former law that the defendant "be imprisoned in the state prison for the term of ten years, five years upon the conviction for assault in the second degree, and five years for the prior conviction of a felony as by the statute made and provided" was not void as to the 5 years for the former conviction. St. v. Connors, 27 M 227, 70 P 715 (1902).

2001 Amendment: Chapter 585 in second sentence substituted "must be forwarded to the state treasurer for deposit in the state general fund" for "must be paid to the county treasurer of the county in which the court is held and by him credited as provided by law. If the fine or forfeiture is paid to the county treasurer, at the time of such payment there shall be filed with the county treasurer a complete statement showing the total of the fine or forfeiture received or incurred with an itemized statement of the costs incurred by the county in such action. The statement shall give the title of the cause and be subscribed by the person or officer making such payment"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2002.

Saving Clause: Section 55, Ch. 585, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

Code Commissioner Instruction: Pursuant to sec. 47, Ch. 257, L. 2001, in version effective July 1, 2002, the code commissioner changed "state treasurer" to "department of revenue".

1987 Amendment: In second sentence, after "if not", inserted "paid to a justice's court or".

Case Notes

Order That Fine Be Paid to Charitable Organization — Reversible Error: The District Court fined defendant his vacation pay and sick leave pay and ordered that those funds be paid to the Great Falls United Way. Because the order did not comply with the statutory payment requirements of this section, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the judgment for further proceedings. St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994).

Attorney General's Opinions

Allocation of Justice's Court Fines and Costs: Money which has been collected as fines and costs in Justice's Court and paid to the County Treasurer by the Justice of the Peace and which remains after the specific allocations made in this section should be credited to the county general fund pursuant to 46-18-235. 41 A.G. Op. 39 (1985).

Restitution Not to Be Made From Forfeited Appearance Bond: A judge is without the authority to order restitution to be made from a forfeited appearance bond. Restitution is not a "cost" of the case that may be defrayed. Section 46-18-603 refers specifically to costs incurred by the county, not by the victim. The money from the forfeited bond is to be paid to the County Treasurer. 38 A.G. Op. 96 (1980).

2023 Amendment: See 2023 Session Law for amendment made by sec. 32, Ch. 167, L. 2023. Amendment effective April 19, 2023.

Severability: Section 38, Ch. 167, L. 2023, was a severability clause.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 285 in (1) substituted "prostitution, promoting prostitution, or another nonviolent offense" for "the offense of prostitution under 45-5-601", before "result" inserted "direct", and substituted "human trafficking" for "trafficking for commercial sexual activity under 45-5-306"; in (2) in three places inserted "human" before "trafficking" and before "or sought services" deleted "for commercial sexual activity"; in (3) at beginning inserted "No official determination or documentation is required to grant a motion by a person under this section, but", in two places substituted "human trafficking" for "trafficking for commercial sexual activity", after "offense" deleted "of prostitution", and before "result" inserted "direct"; in (4) after "conviction" deleted "of prostitution"; inserted (5) defining human trafficking; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2015.

Effective Date: This section is effective October 1, 2013.

Part 7Jail Work Release Program*Part Case Notes

Child Support as Restitution and Condition of Probation: Child support violations were noted in the presentence investigation. Defendant should have known that they might be considered by the court, so there was no due process violation. The District Court properly ordered payment of child support as a form of restitution and rehabilitation and as a legitimate condition of parole. St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988).

Condition of Probation: Under former law, provisions in a probation order permitting the petitioner to have employment outside the county jail, absolving the Sheriff from liability in permitting the petitioner to be absent from his custody without bail, and requiring that the petitioner pay his own board at the jail from his earnings, while similar to some former provisions relating to convicted misdemeanants serving county jail sentences, did not convert a condition of probation into a term of imprisonment. In re Williams' Petition, 145 M 45, 399 P2d 732 (1965).

Case Notes

Alcoholics — Refraining as Valid Condition of Parole: One who, because of addiction or character disorder, is unable to control his excessive drinking of alcoholic beverages has no constitutional or statutory right to release free from limitations on his use of alcohol, either on parole or pursuant to a suspended sentence. There was no merit to appellant's contention that it was vindictive and unreasonable or illegal to require him, an acknowledged alcoholic, to refrain from drinking as a condition of his probation or parole. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed, with regard to the requirement for nexus between the sentencing limitation or condition and the underlying offense, in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Parole Conditions — Application to Suspended Portion of Sentence: Parole conditions set by Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) also applied to period of suspended sentence where court passing sentence did not set conditions upon suspended portion of sentence, particularly where that court expressly directed that when defendant was not in prison he was to be under the supervision of the Board and court could revoke the suspended sentence for violation of those conditions. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Restrictions During Deferral — Abuse of Discretion: When the court deferred imposition of sentence but required the defendants to serve 1 year in the county jail with release for working hours, it abused its discretion to impose reasonable restrictions or conditions during the period of the deferred imposition. St. v. Openshaw, 172 M 511, 565 P2d 319 (1977).

Case Notes

Violent Offender Registration and Disclosure Requirements Not Violative of Privacy or Right of Convicted to Restoration of Rights: The defendant was convicted of arson and received a 4-year suspended sentence. In addition, the sentencing court required him to register as a violent offender for at least 10 years. The defendant appealed the registration requirement. Similar to the defendant in Mount, he argued that the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act, as applied to a violent offender, violated his right to privacy. The Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that the state has a compelling state interest to protect the public and that the Act is narrowly tailored to achieve that interest. St. v. Brooks, 2012 MT 263, 367 Mont. 59, 289 P.3d 105, following St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 Mont. 481, 78 P.3d 829.

No-Contact Provision With Spouse Advances Compelling State Interest — No Violation of Fundamental Marriage Rights: Evidence at trial demonstrated that the defendant was totally controlled by her spouse and as a result had participated in the ongoing sexual abuse of the spouse's daughter. Expert evidence indicated that rehabilitation of the defendant would not be possible if the spouse was allowed to continue control over the defendant. The trial court as part of the sentence ordered the defendant to have no contact with her spouse. The Supreme Court upheld the order, stating that although marriage rights were fundamental and were subject to strict scrutiny, the state had a compelling interest in the rehabilitation of offenders, protection of victims, and protection of society and the no-contact restriction advanced those goals. St. v. Guill, 2011 MT 32, 359 Mont. 225, 225, 248 P.3d 826.

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), and St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087 regarding authority of sentencing court. See also St. v. Birthmark, 2013 MT 86, 369 Mont. 413, 300 P.3d 1140.

Sex Offender Registration and Disclosure Requirements Not Violative of Privacy or Right of Convicted to Restoration of Rights: Mount was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and served his sentence. Nine days after final discharge from prison in 1996, Mount registered as a sexual offender, but he was convicted in 2000 of failing to update the registration as required in 46-23-507. On appeal, Mount asserted that the ongoing registration and disclosure requirements of the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act violated the right to privacy under Art. II, sec. 10, Mont. Const., and constitutional and statutory provisions for reinstatement of the rights of a citizen under Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., and this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. As a fundamental right, the right to individual privacy may be infringed only by a compelling state interest; however, protection of the public from the recidivism of sex offenders, prevention of the victimization of vulnerable children, and assistance in keeping track of sex offenders constitute the requisite compelling interest. Further, Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., and this section apply only to the restoration of civil and political rights, and a conviction for sexual intercourse without consent does not fall under this category of protected rights. Thus, Mount was not deprived of any rights by the registration and disclosure requirements of the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act. St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), followed in Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319 M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004). See also St. v. Brooks, 2012 MT 263, 367 Mont. 59, 289 P.3d 105 (ruling that SVORA did not violate privacy rights of a violent offender).

Addition of Written Sentencing Conditions Not Enunciated Orally at Hearing — Johnson Applied: Drube failed to complete a sex offender program, so the District Court revoked his suspended sentence and sentenced him to a 9-year term, with commitment to the Department of Corrections for the first 5 years and the remainder to be served at the state prison. The court specified that the prison portion of the sentence be suspended as long as Drube met sentencing conditions, including completion of a long-term aftercare program. Drube appealed the sentence on grounds that the court imposed a condition on the sentence that was impossible to fulfill and because the written revocation and sentencing order differed from the oral sentence enunciated at the sentencing hearing. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court affirmed. Drube presented nothing establishing that it would be impossible to complete the sex offender program within the reinstated 5-year commitment to the Department. Arguing that eight written conditions added to the suspended sentence by written order should be stricken, Drube cited St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), for the proposition that when written and oral sentences differ, the oral order prevails. The Supreme Court agreed with the general rule in Lane, but noted that the rule is not absolute. Under St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000), when deciding whether a subsequent written sentencing order is unlawful because it contains conditions not enunciated orally, the court first determines whether a defendant was afforded the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice at hearing and second whether the portion of the written sentence substantively increases the defendant's loss of liberty and sacrifice of property. Here, all the conditions in the 2002 written revocation and sentencing order were contained either in Drube's original sentence or in a 2001 revocation and sentencing order and thus were not new or unknown to Drube, who had the opportunity to respond to the conditions placed on the sentence, nor did Drube present any argument that the eight conditions substantively increased the loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Thus, the 2002 sentencing order was not rendered unlawful by the addition of conditions not imposed orally at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), followed in St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

No Departmental Authority to Modify Sentence During Term of Sentence Through Special Probationary Conditions: Field was sentenced to 16 years in prison with 8 years suspended for felony deviate sexual conduct. After serving a portion of the sentence, Field was placed on probation. The sentencing judge attempted to incorporate conditions that might be imposed on probation by providing that any agent of the Montana Probation and Parole Bureau (now Department of Corrections) was authorized to arrange and establish rules necessary for Field's probation and to modify, increase, or reduce the requirements of the rules. Based on that authority, 4 years after the sentence, a Department probation officer added a handwritten special parole condition that Field not be alone with minor children. When Field violated the special condition, the probationary sentence was revoked. As amended in 1995, this section allows a sentencing judge to incorporate by reference conditions of parole established by the Department at the time that the sentence is imposed, but does not authorize a judge to grant to the Department the power to modify a sentence by imposing subsequent constitutional infringements, such as a restriction on the freedom of association, after the judgment and sentence have been signed. Here, no evidence was offered that the special condition imposed on Field was a standard Department rule at the time of sentencing, and nothing in the sentence allowed for the special condition that Field not be alone with a minor; therefore, Field's incarceration for parole violation was premised on a violation of a special condition that was never imposed by a court. Reversing, the Supreme Court held that sentencing of a defendant to an abridgment of a constitutionally protected interest must be performed by the District Court and articulated at the time of sentencing, not modified by a probation officer 4 years after a sentence is imposed. St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203, 57 St. Rep. 1123 (2000).

Right to Possess Firearms — Not Specifically Prohibited by Judge but Prohibited by State Agency Administering Probation: As a condition of probation, defendant was placed by the judge under the jurisdiction of the Department of Corrections and ordered to comply with the terms and conditions established by the Department. The Department had an administrative rule making nonpossession of firearms a standard condition for probationers. Because the sentencing court did not, as required by this section, specifically enumerate and specifically include in the sentence order a prohibition against possessing a firearm, the Department of Corrections could not, and the rule did not, deprive defendant of the right to possess firearms. (However, see the 1995 amendment to subsection (1) of this section, which reversed this holding.) U.S. v. Brooks, 270 M 136, 890 P2d 759, 52 St. Rep. 113 (1995).

Restoration of Civil Rights Determined by Law of State Where Original Conviction Obtained: When defendant was convicted of felony in North Dakota and moved to Montana during the probationary period, the question of restoration of civil rights is determined by North Dakota law. Conviction would be considered still in existence for purposes of the statute criminalizing a transaction in firearms by a convicted felon, even though under Montana law, civil rights would have been considered restored prior to commission of the gun transaction. U.S. v. Eaton, 31 F3d 789 (1994).

Detention of Prisoner After Expiration of Sentence Not Allowed: The plaintiffs, whose child had been killed by a released prisoner, sued the state in tort on the basis that the state could have initiated civil commitment proceedings against the prisoner, rather than releasing him. The Supreme Court held that the state has no authority to hold a prisoner beyond the expiration of his sentence and no duty to initiate civil proceedings. VanLuchene v. St., 244 M 397, 797 P2d 932, 47 St. Rep. 1609 (1990).

Restriction Not Included in Sentence — Prisoner Suffrage: The constitutional restrictions on the petitioner's suffrage rights while he is in prison are effective regardless of whether the court, under this section, added or omitted such restrictions in the sentence imposed. Emery v. St., 177 M 73, 580 P2d 445 (1978).

Part Case Notes

Robbery With Gun Apparently Under Coat — Sentence of Thirty Years Permissible: Defendant claimed that his 30-year sentence for robbery of a convenience store was disproportionate to the facts (which included a finding that he had his hand under his coat and the store clerk believed he had a gun). The sentence was within the permissible statutory range, there was no clear abuse of discretion, and the sentence was properly reviewable in the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court. St. v. Lewis, 220 M 418, 715 P2d 1064, 43 St. Rep. 492 (1986), following St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

Allegations of Improper Conduct of Counsel — No Disqualification of Judge: In statements made to a presentence investigator and ultimately to the District Judge, Gleed alleged improper conduct by his trial counsel. On appeal, he argued that the seriousness of the charges could have caused the judge to take a negative view in sentencing him and that therefore the judge should have disqualified himself. The proper procedure for disqualifying a judge is outlined in 3-1-802; however, none of the circumstances for disqualification were present in this case. Gleed did not follow the statutory procedure for disqualification, nor did he attempt to have his sentence reviewed by the sentence review division under Title 46, ch. 18, part 9. Instead, he raised the issue on appeal, alleging in a conclusory fashion that the judge was biased against him. The Supreme Court held that there was no merit to Gleed's argument that the judge was biased and should have disqualified himself. Sentence was affirmed. St. v. Gleed, 220 M 56, 713 P2d 543, 43 St. Rep. 169 (1986).

Equitableness of Sentence Considered: Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide and sentenced to 10 years and to an additional consecutive 5 years for the knowing use of a gun while committing the offense. At the time of sentencing, the court had discretion to make the 5 years run either consecutively or concurrently. Section 46-18-221, under which the 5 years was imposed, was later amended to require that a sentence under the section run consecutively. Defendant's contention on appeal that it was error to require the 5 years to run consecutively went to the equity of the requirement and not to its legality and should be directed to the Sentence Review Board rather than to the Supreme Court on appeal from the sentence. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982), followed in St. v. Warnick, 202 M 120, 656 P2d 190, 39 St. Rep. 2369 (1982).

Proportionality Review Sufficient: The function of the Sentence Review Division is to consider the appropriateness of a sentence with respect to an individual offender and as to the particular offense involved. In considering an application for postconviction review, the court held that a proportionality review is sufficient if the Sentence Review Division considers the records of appealed cases. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981).

Fairness of Sentence Under Persistent Offender Statute — Question for Board: A sentence of 100 years is within the maximum allowable by the persistent felony offender statute, and as such does not violate the eighth amendment to the United States Constitution. Challenges to the equitability of a sentence as opposed to its legality are properly directed to the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Jurisdiction Over Revocation Proceedings: For violation of parole conditions imposed by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole), the original sentencing court has the implied power and jurisdiction to revoke a suspension of sentence granted by the Sentence Review Division without violating the double jeopardy protection. In fact, the Sentence Review Division lacks jurisdiction over a revocation proceeding initiated by the State. In re Ratzlaff, 172 M 439, 564 P2d 1312 (1977).

SUPREME COURT ORDERS

Order of May 14, 1998: On May 6, 1998, this Court received a letter from the Honorable William Nels Swandal, Chair of the Sentence Review Division of the Supreme Court of Montana. Judge Swandal pointed out that as a result of this Court's recent opinion in Ranta v. State of Montana, 1998 MT 95, the Sentence Review Division must, in future cases, inform a criminal defendant of his or her right to have representation by counsel in both deciding whether to file an application for sentence review and in appearing and presenting a case to the Sentence Review Division. Judge Swandal's letter went on to state, "It is my understanding that there is no mechanism in place at this time to appoint counsel for defendants at sentence review, or to determine if they qualify for counsel." Judge Swandal suggested discussions to determine an appropriate way to implement the Ranta decision.

The Court having now reviewed and considered Judge Swandal's letter, and his understanding being correct that there is not presently a mechanism in place for the appointment of counsel for defendants at sentence review,

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that whenever a criminal defendant is represented by appointed counsel in proceedings before a Montana district court, counsel's representation of that defendant shall continue throughout any sentence review proceedings under Title 46, Chapter 18, part 9, MCA. Upon a district court's sentencing of such a criminal defendant, the clerk of the district court shall provide notice of such continuing representation to the defendant, his counsel, and counsel for the State.

The Clerk is directed to provide copies of this Order to the members of the Sentence Review Division: The Honorable William Nels Swandal, the Honorable Richard G. Phillips, and the Honorable Jeffrey H. Langton; to all other judges of the district courts of the State of Montana; to all clerks of the district courts of the State of Montana; to Barbara Fairhurst, secretary for the Sentence Review Division; and to the State Bar of Montana with the request that it be published in the next possible issue of the Montana Lawyer.

Order of June 16, 1998: On May 14, 1998, this Court issued an order setting forth the appropriate procedure for the appointment of counsel at sentence review proceedings. We ordered that "whenever a criminal defendant is represented by appointed counsel in proceedings before a Montana district court, counsel's representation of that defendant shall continue throughout any sentence review proceedings under Title 46, Chapter 18, part 9, MCA."

By way of a letter dated June 4, 1998, the Sentence Review Board has asked that we issue a supplemental order in answer to certain questions which have arisen with respect to the appointment and reimbursement of counsel for sentence review proceedings.

In answer to the questions posed by the Sentence Review Board,
IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that, whether appointed or retained, counsel for a criminal defendant shall represent that defendant throughout any sentence review proceedings under Title 46, Chapter 18, part 9, MCA. As with any other case, a criminal defendant represented by retained counsel must pay the cost of that representation. If, however, a defendant is found indigent by the court and represented by appointed counsel, the county from which the conviction arose will pay for that representation.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that, as in other cases, the amount appointed counsel will be reimbursed for representing a criminal defendant on sentence review is to be determined either by the court, or in accordance with the public defender contract.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the correct reimbursement procedure is that employed on all other appeals.

The Clerk of Court is directed to provide copies of this Order to the members of the Sentence Review Division: the Honorable William Nels Swandal, the Honorable Richard G. Phillips, and the Honorable Jeffery H. Langton; to all other judges of the district courts of the State of Montana; to all clerks of the district courts of the State of Montana; to Barbara Fairhurst, secretary for the Sentence Review Division; and to the State Bar of Montana with the request that it be published in the next possible issue of the Montana Lawyer.

Rules of Sentence Review Division:

In order to provide for the more effective administration of the review of sentences imposed on convicted felons in the State of Montana, in accordance with Title 46, Chapter 18, of the Montana Code Annotated, 1985, the Sentence Review Division of the Supreme Court by this order hereby adopted the following rules, thereby superseding all previous such rules.

RULE 1. After notice and within sixty (60) days after a defendant is sentenced to a term of one year or more in the State Prison, the defendant may apply to have his sentence reviewed by the Sentence Review Division of the Supreme Court of Montana. It is the duty of trial counsel to protect the defendants interest in this respect and the duty of the trial court to ensure that the defendant understands he has a right to review of the sentence imposed. If such review is requested, the sentence may be increased, decreased, affirmed as entered by the trial court, or otherwise altered by the Sentence Review Division. The filing of application for review of sentence does not stay execution of the sentence.

RULE 2. The Clerks of the District Courts of the State of Montana shall serve upon persons sentenced to more than one (1) year in the State Prison a completed Montana Sentence Review Form No. 1, together with three (3) blank copies of Montana Sentence Review Form No. 2. The clerk shall further serve upon the defendant a copy of the courts Sentence and Judgment. Service shall also be made when a deferred or suspended sentence is revoked and the defendant is sentenced to more than one (1) year in the State Prison.

RULE 3. The defendants Application for Sentence Review (Montana Sentence Review Form No. 2) must be filed with the Clerk of the District Court for the county from which the defendant was sentenced. In the event the defendant has been sentenced and is serving time upon two sentences from separate counties, separate applications must be submitted to each Clerk of Court for the county from which the defendant was sentenced, if the defendant wants each sentence reviewed.

RULE 4. The Clerk of the District Court will file the original copy of said application for Review of Sentence (Montana Sentence Review Form No. 2) in the court file of the defendant. The Clerk will then complete Clerks Certificate and Statement (Montana Sentence Review Form No. 3) and forward it, together with the original court file and other documents required by Form No. 3 to:

Sentence Review Division
Room 315, Justice Building
215 North Sanders
Helena, MT 59620

RULE 5. The Clerk of the District Court shall forward said Clerks Certificate and Statement, together with all documents required, to the secretary of the Sentence Review Division within ten (10) working days after receipt of the Application for Review of Sentence.

RULE 6. The Clerk of the District Court shall forward a copy of the Application for Review of Sentence (Montana Sentence Review Form No. 2) to the Judge who imposed the sentence and a copy to the County Attorney for the County from which the defendant was sentenced within five (5) working days of receipt of same from the defendant.

RULE 7. In the event the Application for Review of Sentence is filed more than 60 days after the sentence is imposed, the Clerk shall proceed as if it were filed on time. However, the secretary of the Sentence Review Division shall thereafter promptly notify the defendant that the application is untimely and request the defendant file within thirty (30) days a statement of reasons why the Sentence Review Division should hear the matter. The Sentence Review Division will rule upon such matters after said thirty (30) days has elapsed and may refuse to hear such application if the reasons for the late filing are insufficient. The Sentence Review Division will hear late applications which have been caused by the taking of an appeal to the Montana Supreme Court.

When there is a pending appeal or request for post-conviction relief, the application for Sentence Review should not be filed until such time as the petition for post-conviction relief or the appeal has been determined, at which time the defendant shall be given sixty (60) days in which to file for review of the sentence.

RULE 8. The secretary of the Sentence Review Division shall not accept an Application for Review of Sentence directly; all such applications must be filed in compliance with MCA 46-18-903, which requires they be filed with the Clerk of the District Court.

RULE 9. The secretary of the Sentence Review Division shall keep a minute book in which shall be recorded the date and time the completed application for review was received by the Clerk of the District Court. The Sentence Review Division shall hear applications in the order they are received by the respective Clerks of Court unless circumstances make such order impractical or the Sentence Review Division orders otherwise.

RULE 10. The Sentence Review Division records are public records and open to public inspection except for decisions which are pending and which have not been released or finally approved by the judges.

RULE 11. After the Application for Review is filed as herein provided, the secretary of the Sentence Review Division shall accept for filing briefs concerning the review of sentence, and any material considered by the sentencing judge at the time of the imposition of sentence. The Sentence Review Division will not consider any new material, letters, petitions, or matters which were not presented to the sentencing judge.

RULE 12. The Sentence Review Division shall meet at the Montana State Prison, Deer Lodge, Montana, at the Womens Correctional Center in Billings, Montana, or at some other convenient place, at such times as shall be approved by the Division. The secretary shall notify each member of the place and dates of such meetings.

RULE 13. The secretary of the Sentence Review Division shall send notices of the time and place of such hearing at least twenty (20) days prior to such hearing to each of the following:

- A. The judge who imposed the sentence,
- B. The County Attorney for the county from which the defendant was sentenced,
- C. The defendant,
- D. The defendants attorney, if known,
- E. The Montana Defender Project, if involved,
- F. Any other person who has requested such notice.

RULE 14. The Sentence Review Divisions hearings shall be public. Admittance shall be subject to the rules of admission into the Montana State Prison generally. Proceedings shall be as informal as possible to allow full expression by all parties and their attorneys. The Rules of Evidence will serve as a guide but are not binding in the proceeding. The defendant shall have the right to appear and to be represented by counsel. For purposes of this rule, the appearance of the defendant may be accomplished by a video conference so that all participants can see each other. The defendant is not entitled to counsel at the expense of the State of Montana. The defendant will be responsible for retaining an attorney if he or she so chooses. The Montana Defender Project may represent a defendant, but such representation is not required. The State may be represented by the County Attorney and/or Attorney General. By requesting a review of his or her sentence by the Sentence Review Division, and proceeding without an attorney, the defendant waives the right to be represented by an attorney, and his or her sentence may be increased, decreased, or left unchanged by the Division.

RULE 15. The record from which the Sentence Review Division shall conduct its review shall consist of the following:

- A. Copy of the information and affidavit in support of the motion for leave to file,
- B. Copy of plea agreement or transcript setting forth the same,
- C. Pre-sentence report,
- D. Sentence and judgment and reasons for same, or transcript containing said reasons,
- E. Other documents relied on by the sentencing judge,
- F. Transcript of sentencing hearing.

Failure to include any of the foregoing items may be cause for the Sentence Review Division to decline to conduct the sentence review and the Sentence Review Division may remand the same to the Clerk of the District Court for compilation of the necessary documents. If the sentencing judge did not set forth his reasons for sentence, or did not consider a pre-sentence report, or if there are critical matters which should have been presented at the sentencing hearing, the Sentence Review Division may vacate the sentence and remand it for re-sentencing based upon proper documentation. In the event the sentence and judgment contains clerical errors, the Sentence Review Division may vacate the sentence and remand for re-sentencing.

RULE 16. The primary objective of the Sentence Review Division is to provide for uniformity in sentencing when appropriate and to ensure that the interest of the public and the defendant are adequately addressed by the sentence. In reviewing the sentences the Sentence Review Division shall consider the correctional policy of the State of Montana as set forth in the Section 46-18-101 to protect society by preventing crime through punishment and rehabilitation of the convicted. The Sentence Review Division will hold an individual responsible and accountable for his/her actions and shall ensure that persons convicted of crime are dealt with in accordance with their individual characteristics, circumstances, needs and potentialities. The review shall be undertaken to assure that the sentence imposed is based on the following:

- A. The crime committed;
- B. The prospects of rehabilitation of the offenders;
- C. The circumstances under which the crime was committed;
- D. The criminal history of the offender.

The Sentence Review Division shall further review the sentences, with a view to removing dangerous and habitual offenders from society and providing corrective treatment for such long terms as needed. In other cases, the Sentence Review Division shall consider whether the offender could have been dealt with adequately by probation, suspended sentence or fine where such disposition appears practicable and not detrimental to the needs of public safety and the welfare of the individual.

RULE 17. The sentence imposed by the District Court is presumed correct, and the sentence will not be reduced or increased unless it is deemed clearly inadequate or excessive.

RULE 18. The Sentence Review Division will not consider any matter or development subsequent to the imposition of the sentence in the District Court. Matters not to be considered include:

- A. Institutional adjustment,
- B. New social information,
- C. Institutional disciplinary actions pending or had against the defendant,
- D. Work report, or
- E. Inmate release plans.

RULE 19. If the Sentence Review Division orders a different sentence than the one originally imposed, the District Court in a convenient county shall re-sentence the defendant as ordered by the Sentence Review Division.

A. The time served on any sentence reviewed shall be deemed to have been served on the sentence as revised by the Sentence Review Division.

B. The decision of the Sentence Review Division will be final. The decision and reasons for such decision will be stated in a written opinion reported and published in the Montana Reports.

C. Copies of the decisions of the Sentence Review Division shall be furnished to the following:

1. The Clerk of the District Court from which the defendant was originally sentenced,
2. The judge who imposed the sentence reviewed,
3. The County Attorney for the County from which the defendant was originally sentenced,
4. The defendant,
5. The principal officer of the institution where the defendant is confined,
6. The attorney for the defendant or the Montana Defender Project.

RULE 20. Once the defendants application is set for hearing, no continuance will be granted without a written motion and good cause.

RULE 21. The defendants attorney is entitled to inspect and copy any document filed with the Sentence Review Division.

RULE 22. Rehearing may be ordered by the Sentence Review Division upon application in writing directed to the Sentence Review Division within thirty (30) days of notice of the Sentence Review Divisions decision on the original application. Rehearing shall not stay any order or judgment previously made unless the Sentence Review Division specifically stays such previous order or judgment. Only one petition for rehearing shall be permitted by any applicant for sentence review, and the grounds therefor shall be clearly stated in said petition in accordance with rules governing rehearings in the Supreme Court of Montana.

RULE 23. A record, by court reporter or by tape recording, shall be made of all proceedings before the Sentence Review Division, and preserved for five (5) years.

RULE 24. A hearing shall be held on each application for sentence review within 180 days of the date of filing. The division will consider for dismissal any application which has not been heard within such time period. Continuances may be granted only for sufficient cause shown. Ordinarily, failure to have an attorney shall not constitute sufficient cause to grant a continuance.

These rules are effective the 18th day of September, 1997.

Case Notes

Supervisory Control Exercised to Clarify Standard of Review of Sentences by Sentence Review Division: Several defendants who intended to have their sentences reviewed moved that the Sentence Review Division clarify the standard applied to sentences submitted for review. The Division had applied the "clearly inadequate or excessive" standard in Rule 17 of the Division's rules, but defendants asked that the Division instead review cases for equity. Defendants petitioned for supervisory control by the Supreme Court, and the petition was granted pursuant to the court's authority to ensure that the Division complies with applicable constitutional and statutory rules. The court noted that the Legislature did not articulate a specific standard of review, but instead granted the Division authority to adopt rules to expedite sentence review. The court concluded that the Division's rules provide for an appropriately broad review of the totality of the facts and circumstances of each case, including review for equity, disparity, or considerations of justice. Under 46-18-904, the sentence imposed by the District Court is presumed correct, and after a hearing, the Division then decides if this presumption has been overcome and whether a new sentence should be imposed, after determining whether the original sentence was clearly inadequate or excessive. This standard is a valid application of the Division's statutory duty and is the standard to be applied to sentence review. Driver v. Sentence Review Div., 2010 MT 43, 355 Mont. 273, 227 P.3d 1018, clarifying In re Jones, 176 Mont. 412, 578 P.2d 1150 (1978).

Application for Extraordinary Relief from Montana Supreme Court Only Recourse for Defendant Who Wishes to Challenge Decision of the Sentence Review Division: The District Court lacked jurisdiction to review decisions of the Sentence Review Division because it is a division of the Montana Supreme Court. Jordan v. St., 2008 MT 334, 346 M 193, 194 P3d 657, (2008).

Hybrid Standard of Supreme Court Review of Sentencing When Offender Ineligible for Review by Sentence Review Division: In St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937 (1999), the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, discarding the previous two-tiered approach of reviewing sentences for both legality and abuse of discretion, which was considered a carryover from the days before the creation of the Sentence Review Division when the court reviewed all sentencing challenges. However, Montoya created a "no review" window once the Sentence Review Division came into being, which left offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions, but no term of incarceration and thus no eligibility for Sentence Review Division consideration, without a remedy. Therefore, the court fashioned a hybrid standard of review to close the "no review" window. If an offender is sentenced to 1 year or more of actual incarceration and is eligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will apply the Montoya standard and review the sentence for legality only, but if the offender is ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), followed in St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

Challenge to Equity of Sentence Properly With Sentence Review Division, Not Supreme Court: A challenge to the equity of a sentence, as opposed to the legality of a sentence, properly lies with the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court, which does not review a sentence on appeal for mere inequity or disparity. In this case, defendant cloaked an equity challenge in the vestiges of a constitutional argument in seeking Supreme Court review, but the court declined to address it, leaving the matter to the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004), following St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202 (1995), and followed in St. v. Baker, 2008 MT 396, 347 M 159, 197 P3d 1001 (2008).

No Due Process Right to Sentence Review — Actual Incarceration Required Before Sentence Subject to Review — Suspended Sentences Precluded From Review: Holt pleaded guilty to sexual assault, received a 10-year suspended sentence, and subsequently applied for sentence review. The Sentence Review Division denied the application on grounds that Holt did not qualify for sentence review because his sentence was suspended in its entirety and involved no actual incarceration. Holt appealed, alleging violation of his due process rights. After granting Holt's writ of supervisory control pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 2(2), Mont. Const., and former Rule 17(a), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), the Supreme Court held that sentence review is not a constitutional right, but rather a system that the Legislature voluntarily created. Thus, the discretion to determine the circumstances and conditions under which sentence review will be allowed lies with the Legislature, and the state's discretion is not subject to due process concerns unless it offends some principle of justice so deeply rooted in the traditions and conscience of the people as to be ranked fundamental (see Mont. v. Egelhoff, 518 US 37, 135 L Ed 2d 361, 116 S Ct 2013 (1996)). The Sentence Review Division's interpretation of 46-18-903(1), excluding a person who is not incarcerated from sentence review, comports with the rules of statutory construction, is consistent with the sentence review statutes as a whole, reflects the intent of the Legislature, avoids absurd or unduly harsh results, and is entitled to deference because the Division is charged with administration of the sentence review statutes. Because sentence review is a statutory right of relatively recent origin, the due process clauses of the U.S. and Montana Constitutions do not demand that sentence review be available at all, nor do they limit the Legislature's restriction of sentence review to defendants who are actually incarcerated. State ex rel. Holt v. District Court, 2000 MT 142, 300 M 35, 3 P3d 608, 57 St. Rep. 560 (2000).

Standard of Review of Criminal Sentence Clarified — Supreme Court Review of Legality of Sentence Only: In an effort to clear up a prevalent inconsistency in Montana case law regarding the appropriate standard of review of criminal sentences, the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, i.e., whether the sentence is within the parameters provided by statute, which in turn implies de novo review—a sentence is either legal or it is not. The court overruled St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982), St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997), and any other Montana decision that suggests that the Supreme Court will also review criminal sentences for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), followed in St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002). However, see St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), wherein the Supreme Court fashioned a hybrid standard of review for offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions but no term of incarceration who are ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division. In reviewing those sentences, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division.

Authority to Amend Written Judgment to List Reasons for Parole Restriction: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to state its reasons for restricting parole eligibility in the court's original written judgment and that further error occurred when the court amended the written judgment, following remand from the Sentence Review Division, to list the reasons parole was restricted. Under 46-18-117 (now repealed), the District Court may correct an erroneous sentence at any time to correct clerical errors and to make the record reflect what was actually decided, as long as the correction does not set aside the judgment or change what was originally intended. Here, the amended judgment was consistent with the oral pronouncement of judgment and merely set forth the reasons for imposing the parole restriction. Further, 46-18-117 (now repealed) allows correction of a sentence following remand from an appellate court. The Sentence Review Division functions as part of the appellate process. Thus, when the Division remanded the matter to the District Court for clarification, the court had the express statutory authority to issue an order amending the written judgment to list its reasons for imposing the parole eligibility restriction. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999).

Failure to Appoint Counsel for Defendant During Sentence Review Process — Sentence Review as Critical Stage of Proceedings: To the extent that the Sentence Review Division has the power to impose any sentence that could be imposed by the District Court, including increasing a sentence, sentence review is a critical stage of the proceedings against a defendant because of the potential for substantial prejudice from possible further loss of liberty. Therefore, assistance of counsel is necessary to aid a defendant in presenting the defendant's case during all stages of the review process. Defendant's mere appearance before the Sentence Review Division does not constitute a valid waiver of the right to counsel. Thus, it is the duty of the Sentence Review Division to inform a defendant of the right to counsel representation both when deciding whether to file an application for review and when appearing and presenting a case to the Division. The Sentence Review Division rule holding to the contrary was held to be unconstitutional. Ranta v. St., 1998 MT 95, 288 M 391, 958 P2d 670, 55 St. Rep. 378 (1998), following Consiglio v. Warden, St. Prison, 220 A2d 269 (Conn. 1966).

Suspended Sentence Properly Revoked — No Supreme Court Review of Disparate Sentences: Baisch's sentence was suspended on condition that, among other things, he remain law-abiding, undergo a psychological examination, and complete his graduate equivalency diploma within 1 year. When Baisch's probation officer called Baisch in to inquire as to why he was not meeting appointments in fulfilling his diploma requirements, Baisch became belligerent and was arrested for assault and criminal mischief. The charges were dismissed because of a defect in language, but the state petitioned to revoke the suspended sentence anyway. The state met its burden of showing by a preponderance of the evidence that Baisch violated the terms of probation, and the District Court did not err in reinstating Baisch's 7-year prison term. Baisch's argument that the sentence was too harsh was not appropriate for consideration by the Supreme Court because arguments of that nature are reserved for consideration by the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Baisch, 1998 MT 12, 287 M 191, 953 P2d 1070, 55 St. Rep. 41 (1998), followed in St. v. Senn, 2003 MT 52, 314 M 348, 66 P3d 288 (2003).

This section empowers the review division to review sentences of incarceration for one year or more in the State Prison. Upon imposition of sentence, the clerk of the sentencing Court must give the defendant written notice of this right of appeal to the review division and notice of the possibility that his sentence may be increased on appeal. The trial Judge may submit a statement of his reasons for a particular sentence to the review division and the review division may require the submission of such a statement.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 69 in (1) near beginning of first sentence after "prison" inserted "or to the custody of the department of corrections" and near middle of second sentence after "sentenced" inserted "and to the person's counsel"; in (2) at end of first sentence inserted "and the person's counsel of record"; in (3) after "grant" inserted "or deny"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

Case Notes

No Withdrawal of Sentence Review Petition After Hearing: A petitioner filed an application to have his sentence reviewed. After the hearing, the petitioner sought to withdraw his application. After the Sentence Review Division denied the withdrawal, the petitioner appealed to the Supreme Court, which concluded that once a petitioner files an application with the Sentence Review Division to consider an imposed sentence and a hearing is held, the petitioner cannot withdraw the application prior to the Division's ruling. Avery v. Batista, 2014 MT 266, 376 Mont. 404, 336 P.3d 924.

Hybrid Standard of Supreme Court Review of Sentencing When Offender Ineligible for Review by Sentence Review Division: In St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937 (1999), the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, discarding the previous two-tiered approach of reviewing sentences for both legality and abuse of discretion, which was considered a carryover from the days before the creation of the Sentence Review Division when the court reviewed all sentencing challenges. However, Montoya created a “no review” window once the Sentence Review Division came into being, which left offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions, but no term of incarceration and thus no eligibility for Sentence Review Division consideration, without a remedy. Therefore, the court fashioned a hybrid standard of review to close the “no review” window. If an offender is sentenced to 1 year or more of actual incarceration and is eligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will apply the Montoya standard and review the sentence for legality only, but if the offender is ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), followed in St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

No Due Process Right to Sentence Review — Actual Incarceration Required Before Sentence Subject to Review — Suspended Sentences Precluded From Review: Holt pleaded guilty to sexual assault, received a 10-year suspended sentence, and subsequently applied for sentence review. The Sentence Review Division denied the application on grounds that Holt did not qualify for sentence review because his sentence was suspended in its entirety and involved no actual incarceration. Holt appealed, alleging violation of his due process rights. After granting Holt’s writ of supervisory control pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 2(2), Mont. Const., and former Rule 17(a), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), the Supreme Court held that sentence review is not a constitutional right, but rather a system that the Legislature voluntarily created. Thus, the discretion to determine the circumstances and conditions under which sentence review will be allowed lies with the Legislature, and the state’s discretion is not subject to due process concerns unless it offends some principle of justice so deeply rooted in the traditions and conscience of the people as to be ranked fundamental (see Mont. v. Egelhoff, 518 US 37, 135 L Ed 2d 361, 116 S Ct 2013 (1996)). The Sentence Review Division’s interpretation of subsection (1) of this section, excluding a person who is not incarcerated from sentence review, comports with the rules of statutory construction, is consistent with the sentence review statutes as a whole, reflects the intent of the Legislature, avoids absurd or unduly harsh results, and is entitled to deference because the Division is charged with administration of the sentence review statutes. Because sentence review is a statutory right of relatively recent origin, the due process clauses of the U.S. and Montana Constitutions do not demand that sentence review be available at all, nor do they limit the Legislature’s restriction of sentence review to defendants who are actually incarcerated. State ex rel. Holt v. District Court, 2000 MT 142, 300 M 35, 3 P3d 608, 57 St. Rep. 560 (2000).

Lack of Sentence Review Process for Misdemeanants Not Violative of Equal Protection: The plain language of this section applies the sentence review process only to felons facing incarceration in the state prison, not to misdemeanants. Because felons and misdemeanants are not similarly situated classes, the lack of a sentence review process for misdemeanants does not violate equal protection guarantees. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999).

Application for Sentence Review Not Considered Direct Appeal — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: Postconviction relief provides a defendant with a procedure to address claims that would have been raised by means of a petition for writ of habeas corpus or a writ of error coram nobis, while the Sentence Review Division reviews the equity of a sentence. The plain language of 46-21-105 makes it clear that an application for review of a sentence, as contained in this section, is not a direct appeal within the context of 46-21-105. Further, the common-law rule of plain error does not extend to cases in which a defendant had the opportunity to challenge a dangerous offender designation on direct appeal but chose not to. St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

This section gives the review division the authority to substitute any sentence the trial judge could have imposed, including an increased term. It is intended that the statute be construed so as to prevent the consideration of the evidence which was not before the trial judge, such as post-sentence rehabilitation, and cooperation, but allows the division to require the production of pre-sentence reports, transcript of sentencing day proceedings, and other documents such as psychiatric reports that were before the primary sentencing authority, and any other relevant material that could have or should have been obtained at the time of sentencing.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 69 in (1)(a)(i) after "imposed" deleted "either increasing or decreasing the penalty"; at end of (1)(a)(ii) inserted "including a decrease or increase in the penalty"; in (2) at beginning of second sentence substituted "The person requesting the review may appear and has the right to be represented by counsel" for "The appellant may appear and be represented by counsel"; in (3) near end of second sentence substituted "person" for "defendant"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

1985 Amendment: In (2) inserted last sentence allowing other interested persons to attend and participate in the review; and in (3) inserted first sentence creating a presumption that the District Court sentence is correct.

Case Notes

No Withdrawal of Sentence Review Petition After Hearing: A petitioner filed an application to have his sentence reviewed. After the hearing, the petitioner sought to withdraw his application. After the Sentence Review Division denied the withdrawal, the petitioner appealed to the Supreme Court, which concluded that once a petitioner files an application with the Sentence Review Division to consider an imposed sentence and a hearing is held, the petitioner cannot withdraw the application prior to the Division's ruling. Avery v. Batista, 2014 MT 266, 376 Mont. 404, 336 P.3d 924.

Supervisory Control Exercised to Clarify Standard of Review of Sentences by Sentence Review Division: Several defendants who intended to have their sentences reviewed moved that the Sentence Review Division clarify the standard applied to sentences submitted for review. The Division had applied the "clearly inadequate or excessive" standard in Rule 17 of the Division's rules, but defendants asked that the Division instead review cases for equity. Defendants petitioned for supervisory control by the Supreme Court, and the petition was granted pursuant to the court's authority to ensure that the Division complies with applicable constitutional and statutory rules. The court noted that the Legislature did not articulate a specific standard of review, but instead granted the Division authority to adopt rules to expedite sentence review. The court concluded that the Division's rules provide for an appropriately broad review of the totality of the facts and circumstances of each case, including review for equity, disparity, or considerations of justice. Under 46-18-904, the sentence imposed by the District Court is presumed correct, and after a hearing, the Division then decides if this presumption has been overcome and whether a new sentence should be imposed, after determining whether the original sentence was clearly inadequate or excessive. This standard is a valid application of the Division's statutory duty and is the standard to be applied to sentence review. Driver v. Sentence Review Div., 2010 MT 43, 355 Mont. 273, 227 P.3d 1018, clarifying In re Jones, 176 Mont. 412, 578 P.2d 1150 (1978).

Failure to Appoint Counsel for Defendant During Sentence Review Process — Sentence Review as Critical Stage of Proceedings: To the extent that the Sentence Review Division has the power to impose any sentence that could be imposed by the District Court, including increasing a sentence, sentence review is a critical stage of the proceedings against a defendant because of the potential for substantial prejudice from possible further loss of liberty. Therefore, assistance of counsel is necessary to aid a defendant in presenting the defendant's case during all stages of the review process. Defendant's mere appearance before the Sentence Review Division does not constitute a valid waiver of the right to counsel. Thus, it is the duty of the Sentence Review Division to inform a defendant of the right to counsel representation both when deciding whether to file an application for review and when appearing and presenting a case to the Division. The Sentence Review Division rule holding to the contrary was held to be unconstitutional. Ranta v. St., 1998 MT 95, 288 M 391, 958 P.2d 670, 55 St. Rep. 378 (1998), following Consiglio v. Warden, St. Prison, 220 A2d 269 (Conn. 1966).

Stiffening of Sentence by Sentence Review Division That Found Original Sentence Not Inadequate: Offender pleaded guilty to aggravated assault and was sentenced to 20 years in the state prison. The Sentence Review Division found that the sentence was not inadequate or excessive, but modified the sentence to provide for no parole until 7 years had been served and to require completion of the prison's anger management program and other counseling considered appropriate by the staff. The Division stated that the modification was made because during the sentence review hearing, offender showed no remorse or concern for the victim, showed disdain for the victim, and accepted no responsibility for his actions. On petition for postconviction relief, the court held that having found that the original sentence was not inadequate, the Sentence Review Division lacked jurisdiction to alter the sentence. The court struck the modification from the sentence. St. v. Torres, 277 M 514, 922 P2d 1180, 53 St. Rep. 826 (1996).

Review of Sentence for Inequity: Review of a sentence for mere inequity or disparity is for the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court, which will review only for legality of the sentence, under the abuse of discretion standard. St. v. Lloyd, 208 M 195, 676 P2d 229, 41 St. Rep. 263 (1984), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991). See also St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

Implications of Decision to Let Sentence Stand: Given the function of the Sentence Review Division, its decision to leave as originally imposed a 40-year sentence for robbery amounts to an implicit finding that the sentence was not so greatly disproportionate to the crime so as to constitute cruel and unusual punishment. In re Jones, 176 M 412, 578 P2d 1150 (1978), clarified in Driver v. Sentence Review Div., 2010 MT 43, 355 Mont. 273, 227 P.3d 1018, to the extent that the proper standard of sentence review by the Sentence Review Division is first whether the sentence imposed by the District Court is presumed correct, and after a hearing, whether this presumption has been overcome and whether a new sentence should be imposed, after determining if the original sentence was clearly inadequate or excessive.

Sentence Increase: An increase of a sentence under this section did not constitute double jeopardy or denial of due process or equal protection of the laws. St. v. Henrich, 162 M 114, 509 P2d 288 (1973).

Questions Reviewable: The Review Division established by this chapter provides appellate review of "legal" sentences and therefore could not review the contention of the defendant that his sentence under 45-9-102 was "illegal" because he was denied the statutory presumption in favor of deferred imposition. St. v. Simtob, 154 M 286, 462 P2d 873 (1969).

No Credit for Time Served on Informal House Arrest: The District Court conditioned Gulbranson’s release on bond with informal house arrest. Gulbranson contended that the house arrest restricted his liberty in a manner sufficiently similar to incarceration, as provided in 46-18-403, to require that he be given credit for time served. However, Gulbranson did not cite any legal authority to support the contention, and the Supreme Court declined to consider the unsupported argument. Instead, the Supreme Court held that the informal house arrest in this case was not house arrest as provided for in this part, so 46-18-203 did not require that Gulbranson’s sentences be credited with time served for that period. Gulbranson failed to show that the District Court was statutorily required to credit him for time served while released on bond, so it was within the District Court’s discretion whether to allow credit. Absent an abuse of discretion, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gulbranson, 2003 MT 139, 316 M 163, 69 P3d 1187 (2003), followed in *St. v. Speeding Ticket Not Misdemeanor for Expungement Purposes — Venue Improper — Petition to Expunge Dismissed: The petitioner filed a petition in Flathead County to expunge his criminal record under the Misdemeanor Expungement Clarification Act. The Flathead County Attorney consented to expungement, noting that the only record of offense in that county was a speeding ticket. After the District Court granted the petition, Gallatin County appeared and moved to dismiss the expungement. Gallatin County argued that Flathead County was an improper venue because a petition for expungement must be filed in a county in which the petitioner has committed a misdemeanor. Gallatin County argued that the speeding ticket in Flathead County was not a misdemeanor and, in fact, the only misdemeanors the petitioner had committed were in Gallatin County. The District Court agreed, vacated its order, and dismissed the petition without prejudice. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, confirming that a speeding ticket is not a criminal offense and therefore could not establish venue under the Act. Insufficient Pleading for Expungement of DUI Misdemeanor — Petition Properly Dismissed: The petitioner filed a petition in Flathead County to expunge his criminal misdemeanors in the state. Although the petition did not provide any information about the misdemeanors committed by the petitioner, the Flathead County Attorney consented to the expungement, noting that the only record of an offense in Flathead County was a speeding ticket. After the District Court granted expungement, Gallatin County appeared and objected to the expungement of the petitioner's misdemeanors, which also included a DUI in Gallatin County. Gallatin County argued that the petitioner was not entitled to a presumption of expungement on the DUI offense and that the petition failed to meet the evidentiary burden to expunge the offense. Accordingly, the District Court vacated its order to expunge and dismissed it without prejudice. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, agreeing that the petition lacked supporting evidence and therefore the petitioner had not met his burden of proof to expunge the DUI offense. CHAPTER 19 EXECUTION OF JUDGMENT

Part 1 Method of Execution

Part Case Notes

Concurrent Felony and Misdemeanor Sentences: When the defendant is convicted of a felony under the first portion of a consolidated information and of a misdemeanor under the second portion, and the trial court decrees that the sentences can be served concurrently, the sentence for the felony should be served in the state prison, credit for the misdemeanor fine should be given at the same time, and any remaining time under the misdemeanor at the end of the state prison term should be served in the county jail. St. v. Bogue, 142 M 459, 384 P2d 749 (1963).

Punishment for Contempt: An attorney found guilty of contempt was properly subject to punishment by fine and imprisonment until the fine was paid. State ex rel. Coleman v. District Court, 51 M 195, 149 P 973 (1915).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 141 substituted text relating to commitment of a defendant and delivery of the defendant by the sheriff to the place of confinement, together with an order signed by the sentencing judge constituting authority for holding the defendant, for former text that read: "Upon rendition of judgment after pronouncement of a sentence imposing punishment of imprisonment or death, the court shall commit the defendant to the custody of the sheriff, who shall deliver the defendant to the place of his confinement or execution." Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Case Notes

Prison's Custody Classification as Alleged Violation of Plea Bargaining Agreement — Withdrawal of Plea Denied: Under a plea bargain agreement, defendant was sentenced to 10 years as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) without parole. Upon entering prison, he was held in close custody for 24 months under prison rules calling for dangerous offenders and those sentenced without parole to serve 24 months in close custody prior to being considered for transfer to lower, more amenable custody levels. The prosecution, defense counsel, defendant, and judge were all unaware of those rules. Defendant was not entitled to withdraw his plea on the ground he was kept in close custody for 24 months in violation of his plea agreement. There was no violation of the agreement, nor was he entitled to the additional good time credits he would have received had he not been held so long in close custody. Prison officials take many factors into account in making custody reclassifications, and there was no guarantee he would have been held in close custody only for the time he claimed he should have been upon entry to the prison. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984).

Alteration of Judgment: The warden of the state prison has no authority to change or alter a judgment of conviction in any particular. State ex rel. Nelson v. Ellsworth, 141 M 78, 375 P2d 316 (1962).

Authority to Detain:

Proceedings in contempt are in their nature criminal, and the order adjudging one in contempt is in its nature a final judgment, but the Sheriff cannot execute a judgment in a criminal matter or proceeding without "competent authority", as provided in 7-32-2205. Hence, when one has been committed for contempt and the Sheriff does not hold a certified copy of the order of commitment, he is not authorized to detain the person so committed. In re Mettler, 50 M 299, 146 P 747 (1915).

The certified copy of the judgment is the evidence of the warden's authority for detaining the prisoner. Stephens v. Conley, 48 M 352, 138 P 189 (1914).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 510 in (1) near middle inserted "any unpaid interest accrued on the judgment, and costs and fees incurred in collecting the judgment"; inserted (3) authorizing court to contract with private person or entity to collect judgment, authorizing assigned private person or entity to institute suit or lawful collection procedures and postjudgment remedies in person's or entity's own name, authorizing court to pay reasonable fee, after deducting required charges, to private person or entity for judgment collection, and requiring fee incurred by court to be added to judgment amount; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 388 in (2), after "detained", substituted "and allowed a credit for each day of incarceration as provided in 46-18-403" for "until the judgment is complied with. The imprisonment must not exceed 1 day for every $25 of the fine"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 12, 1995.

1989 Amendment: In (2), in second sentence, increased rate at which fine is paid off by imprisonment to $25 from $10 per day; and made minor changes in phraseology.

Case Notes

Fine or Imprisonment:

A judgment under former law requiring a defendant who was convicted on three counts of an information charging violations of the liquor law to pay a fine of $200 and to serve 60 days in the county jail on each count and, if the fines were not paid, to serve them out at the rate of 1 day for each $2 of the fines was held not uncertain or ambiguous. It meant that he would be imprisoned for a total of 180 days and would serve 1 day for each $2 of the fines aggregating $600. In re Pyle, 72 M 494, 234 P 254 (1925).

The District Court had the power under a former statute to impose a sentence of imprisonment in the county jail for a certain number of days, the defendant in addition to pay a fine in a stated amount and, in default of payment, to stand committed 1 day for every $2 of the fine after expiration of the term of imprisonment until the fine was paid. In re Londres, 54 M 418, 170 P 1045 (1918).

A judgment under former law in a case of misdemeanor, imposing a fine of $500 and providing that in default of payment the defendant be imprisoned "for the term of one day for each $2 of said fine", was sufficiently definite and certain. State ex rel. Poindexter v. District Court, 51 M 186, 149 P 958 (1915).

Attorney General's Opinions

Imprisonment in County Jail Upon Failure to Pay Traffic Fine: Both 61-8-711 and 46-19-102 concern imprisonment upon failure to pay fines for traffic offenses. Because a particular statute governs when a general statute and a particular statute on the same subject are inconsistent, 61-8-711 governs. However, if the failure to pay is based on indigency, constitutional issues arise. The courts have recognized the infirmity of imposing a fine as a sentence and then converting it into a jail term simply because the defendant is indigent and cannot forthwith pay the fine in full. 38 A.G. Op. 61 (1980).

Commission Comments

Source: [R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-8007, 94-8016 through 94-8018.]

This section does not change the law in any way but merely combines into one provision separate statutes dealing with execution of the death sentence. It should be noted that the commission has not considered the propriety of capital punishment, but has redrafted a law in conformity with what appears to be the present public policy of this state.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 387 in (3) near end before "pronounces" substituted "coroner or deputy coroner" for "licensed physician" and at end after "dead" deleted "according to accepted standards of medical practice"; in (6)(b) substituted present language designating the makeup of witnesses for an execution for former language that read: "The warden shall allow the execution to be observed by 12 witnesses, 3 of whom may be designated by the person to be executed"; inserted (6)(c) providing grounds for rejection of a witness by the department of corrections; inserted (8) providing that rejection of a witness is not grounds for staying an execution; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 491 in (2) substituted "the Montana state prison or the Montana women's prison" for "a state prison". Amendment effective April 27, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 92 in (3), after "inflicted by", deleted "hanging the defendant by the neck until he is dead or, at the election of the defendant, by" and deleted second sentence that read: "A defendant who wishes to choose execution by lethal injection shall do so at the hearing at which an execution date is set, and if he does not, the option to choose death by lethal injection is waived"; in (4), in second sentence, substituted "director of the department of corrections" for "warden of the state prison" and in third sentence substituted "director" for "warden" and after "judgment" deleted "method of execution"; in first sentence in (6), after "execution", deleted "carried out by lethal injection"; in (7), after "time", deleted "mode, and manner in which"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 19, 1997.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 92, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [46-19-103 and 46-23-301] applies to death warrants issued by a court on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 19, 1997.

1989 Amendment: In second sentence of (1) substituted "20" for "5"; inserted last sentence of (3) relating to time for choosing execution by lethal injection; inserted (4) relating to preparation, delivery, and contents of death warrant; in (5) substituted reference to subsection (6) for reference to subsection (5) and inserted last two sentences relating to anonymity of executioner and confidentiality of facts pertaining to his selection and training; and at beginning of (7) inserted "Within 20 days" and after "the warden shall" substituted "return the death warrant to the clerk of the court from which it was issued, noting on the warrant the time, mode, and manner" for "make a return upon the death warrant showing time, mode, and manner". Amendment effective April 15, 1989.

1987 Amendment: In (4), in second sentence, changed "subsection (4)" to "subsection (5)".

1983 Amendments — Applicability: Chapter 292 inserted (2) authorizing the Sheriff to deliver defendant to the State Prison and placing confinement costs on the state.

Chapter 411, in (3), after "by the neck until he is dead" inserted optional provision for death by lethal injection; in (4), substituted language requiring the prison warden to provide a suitable room for executions and all implements necessary, to select the person to perform the execution, and to supervise the execution for "A sentence of death must be executed within the walls or yard of a jail or some convenient private place in the county where the trial took place."; in (5), substituted language concerning an execution carried out by lethal injection and requiring witnesses for "The sheriff of the county must be present and shall supervise such execution which shall be conducted in the presence of a physician, the county attorney of the county, and at least 12 reputable citizens to be selected by the sheriff. The sheriff shall, at the request of the defendant, permit such priests or ministers, not exceeding two, as the defendant may name and only persons, relatives, or friends, not to exceed five, to be present at the execution together with such peace officers as he may think expedient to witness the execution. No other persons than those mentioned in this subsection can be present at the execution, nor can any person under age be allowed to witness the same."; and in (6), changed "sheriff" to "warden".

Section 7, Ch. 411, L. 1983, provided: "This act applies to death sentences whether first pronounced before or after its effective date. The legislature intends this act to apply retroactively under 1-2-109." Effective on passage and approval, April 7, 1983.

1981 Amendment: Added the last sentence of (1) relating to setting the execution date after a stay.

Case Notes

Abolition of Hanging — No Denial of Right to Attack Hanging as Unconstitutional: Execution by hanging does not violate the eighth amendment. Even if it did, the petitioner's execution would not thus be prevented because the alternative method, lethal injection, could be used, and he is not attacking that method. When the 1997 Montana Legislature abolished hanging, the eighth amendment claim became moot. Petitioner has no constitutionally protected interest in a choice of death penalty punishment. His claim that hanging, which he had selected, violated the eighth amendment and that the Legislature's abolishment of hanging denies him a vested right in that claim, a claim he asserts would have prevailed, resulting in the fact that he could not be executed by lethal injection, is denied. Abolition of hanging was not a bill of attainder intended to render the petitioner's claim moot. Langford v. Day, 134 F3d 1381 (9th Cir. 1998).

Criteria Met for Supreme Court Jurisdiction of Death Row Petition for Injunctive Relief: Pursuant to the version of this section that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended this section by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford then filed an original proceeding with the Montana Supreme Court, asserting that the state impermissibly truncated his ability to fully appeal his death sentence by removing hanging as a means of execution and that the state should be permanently enjoined from executing him under the current version of this section. After examining the applicable statutory criteria, the Supreme Court accepted jurisdiction of the petition for writ of injunction because: (1) the state was clearly a party to the action; (2) the public had an interest in establishing and maintaining the validity of state actions in a proceeding that attempted to curtail the state's ability to enact, amend, and enforce state legislation; and (3) Langford's imminent execution constituted sufficient emergency circumstances to render due consideration in the trial court and appeal to the Supreme Court an inadequate remedy. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997).

Deletion of Hanging as Form of Capital Punishment Not Bill of Attainder: Pursuant to the version of this section that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended this section by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford asserted that the amendment to this section constituted a bill of attainder in violation of Art. II, sec. 30, Mont. Const., inflicting punishment without a judicial trial. However, this section does not inflict punishment, but simply delineates the procedure by which a previously imposed sentence is carried out. Thus, the amendment to this section was not a bill of attainder. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997).

Deletion of Hanging as Form of Capital Punishment Not Denial of Ability to Present Argument Regarding Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Pursuant to the version of this section that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended this section by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford asserted that the amendment to this section violated numerous constitutional provisions by denying him the ability to present the cruel and unusual punishment argument to the federal courts. The Supreme Court found no merit in Langford's argument that the state Attorney General advised the Legislature to amend this section in order to deny Langford the grounds for appeal, because the Attorney General supported but did not initiate the legislation. Further, the court did not agree with Langford's assertion that the amendment rendered the time that Langford spent in pursuing the cruel and unusual punishment argument retroactively useless and chargeable to the state as a form of cruel and unusual punishment in itself, because the eighth amendment argument was not the only claim that Langford pursued. Therefore, the entire time could not be charged to the state as being related to the amendment to this section. Having concluded that Langford failed to establish any constitutional violations, his petition for writ of injunction staying his execution was denied. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997).

Deletion of Hanging as Form of Capital Punishment Not Ex Post Facto Application: Pursuant to the version of this section that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended this section by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford asserted that the amendment to this section constituted an ex post facto law in violation of Art. II, sec. 31, Mont. Const., because it effectively removed his defense of arguing that hanging was cruel and unusual punishment. However, Langford was not asserting a defense to a crime with which he was charged; he had already pleaded guilty and been sentenced, and the validity of the convictions was not at issue. The Supreme Court found no ex post facto violation because Langford's purely conjectural assertions that he potentially would have a due process-type right to avoid execution under the earlier version of the statute did not create a current substantive right that would be infringed by an amendment altering only the procedure by which his sentence would be carried out. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997). See also McKenzie v. Day, 57 F3d 1461 (9th Cir. 1995).

State Not Required to Wait Five Years to Execute Convict: Upon the dissolution of Gollehon's stay of execution, the District Court set a new execution date within 90 days of the hearing dissolving the stay, as required by this section. Gollehon argued that the state could not execute him prior to the expiration of the 5-year period provided in 46-21-102 for petitioning for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court held that the provisions concerning postconviction relief do not override the statutory language requiring the setting of a new execution date upon the dissolution of a stay of execution. Gollehon v. District Court, 271 M 363, 897 P2d 1058, 52 St. Rep. 447 (1995), followed in State ex rel. Turner v. District Court, 271 M 392, 897 P2d 1060, 52 St. Rep. 498 (1995).

Authority of Replacement Judge to Reset Execution Date: McKenzie argued that the judge presiding over the resetting of McKenzie's execution date had no jurisdiction to do so because the original presiding judge or that judge's successor did not enter an order conferring jurisdiction. However, this section rather than 3-1-804 controls in this situation. This section reposes the act of setting the execution date and signing the death warrant in the court in which the defendant was sentenced. Because both judges preside in the same district, resetting of the execution by the subsequent judge was proper and the requirement in 3-1-804, which relates to the substitution of District Court Judges, did not apply. St. v. McKenzie, 271 M 32, 894 P2d 289, 52 St. Rep. 312 (1995).

No Discharge of Prisoner Sentenced to Die Based on Failure to Execute Death Warrant on Date Fixed: McKenzie contended that under the law in effect at the time that he was sentenced to death in 1975 (section 95-2303(b), R.C.M. 1947, a predecessor to this section), the execution had to be conducted within 60 days of sentencing and the sentencing court had no jurisdiction to reset the execution date if the 60 days elapsed. However, the section was amended in 1981 to require the court to set a new execution date upon dissolution of a stay of execution. Because the order resetting the execution date was merely a procedural, ministerial act that did not affect McKenzie's substantial rights, the controlling law was the law in effect at the time of the court's resetting the execution date. The Supreme Court also cited several out-of-state court precedents for the proposition that failure to execute a death warrant on the date fixed does not result in immunity to or discharge of a person sentenced to die but requires the fixing of a new execution date. Thus, the resentencing court did not err in resetting the execution date according to this section. St. v. McKenzie, 271 M 32, 894 P2d 289, 52 St. Rep. 312 (1995).

No Violation of Ex Post Facto Prohibitions: This section, imposing an obligation to set a date of execution at the time that sentence is pronounced, does not confer upon a state trial court any authority to reconsider a death sentence once it has been pronounced and therefore does not violate ex post facto prohibitions. McKenzie v. Day, 57 F3d 1461 (1995).

Failure to Choose Method of Execution as Waiver of Right to Election of Methods: Defendant chose not to speak in answer to the sentencing court's question concerning method of execution. Defendant's silence constituted a waiver of the right to election of methods, rendering moot any later arguments regarding whether execution by hanging can be considered cruel and unusual punishment. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993). See also St. v. Langford, 254 M 44, 833 P2d 1127 (1992).

Election of Hanging as Precluding Contention That Hanging a Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Langford sought a declaration that punishment by hanging was a cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const.). However, he had been afforded an ample opportunity under this section to elect lethal injection over hanging as the form of execution but chose not to do so. Accordingly, he rendered moot any claim concerning the constitutionality of hanging as a method of execution. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Langford, 254 M 44, 833 P2d 1127, 49 St. Rep. 615 (1992).

1983 Amendments Not Bill of Attainder: Chapter 411, L. 1983, amended 46-19-103 to allow the defendant to choose death by lethal injection as an alternative to hanging. Section 7 makes the act applicable to death sentences whether first pronounced before or after its effective date, making the act specifically retroactive. The act is not a bill of attainder as argued by the defendant who was convicted before the effective date of the act and sentenced to death after its effective date. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Fitzpatrick, 211 M 341, 684 P2d 1112, 41 St. Rep. 1400 (1984).

Hanging Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: There is no evidence that shows that death from hanging, when properly carried out, is anything other than swift and immediate or that hanging results in any more suffering than that associated with other modes of execution. The Supreme Court has no power to change the legislatively settled provisions of the sentence in the absence of constitutional violation. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000 (1979).

APPEALSChapter Compiler's Comments

Supreme Court Rules Governing Criminal Appellate Procedure — Certain Title 46, Ch. 20, Sections Superseded: A June 16, 1986, order of the Montana Supreme Court, which became effective on January 19, 1987, amended the Rules of Appellate Civil Procedure by deleting “Civil” from the title and extensively amending the rules to make them applicable to both civil and criminal appellate civil procedure. The court’s order stated that certain Title 46, ch. 20, sections were superseded. The superseded sections are: 46-20-102, 46-20-201, 46-20-202, 46-20-203, 46-20-301, 46-20-302, 46-20-303, 46-20-304, 46-20-305, 46-20-306, 46-20-311, 46-20-312, 46-20-313, 46-20-314, 46-20-315, 46-20-316, 46-20-317, 46-20-318, 46-20-319, 46-20-401, 46-20-402, 46-20-403, 46-20-404, 46-20-405, 46-20-406, 46-20-407, 46-20-408, 46-20-409, 46-20-410, 46-20-501, 46-20-502, 46-20-503, 46-20-504, 46-20-511, 46-20-512, 46-20-513, 46-20-601, 46-20-602, 46-20-603, 46-20-604, 46-20-704, 46-20-705.

The advisory commission note preceding the rules as amended reads: “The procedure covering appeals in criminal cases to the supreme court of Montana from Montana district courts has heretofore been found in various statutes. It was decided that for convenience the rules governing procedure for appellate practice should be equally applicable to civil and criminal cases, the same as found in the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure. Many of the proposed amendments are minor, designed to make them applicable to criminal cases as well as civil. In such cases, no further advisory commission notes appear necessary.”

Interim Study of Delays: SJR 30 (1981) requested an interim study of delays in the administration of appeals of criminal cases in the criminal justice system of Montana and means by which the institutional causes of these delays could be lawfully eliminated and required a report of the findings of the study to the Legislature. The Legislative Council designated the Joint Subcommittee on Judiciary to conduct the study.

Chapter Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER CHAPTER 20

No Action Required by District Court to Lift Stay on Sentence After Conviction Affirmed on Appeal — Execution of Sentence After 552 Days Erroneous: The defendant was convicted of first offense misdemeanor DUI and granted a stay of his sentence pending appeal. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, and the District Court issued a notice of remittitur to the parties. Five hundred fifty two days later, the state moved to lift the stay on the defendant’s sentence. The District Court granted the motion and the defendant appealed, arguing that execution of the sentence after such a significant delay would violate Montana’s sentencing policy as articulated in 46-18-101, 46-18-102, and 46-18-115, as well as his right to due process of the law. The Supreme Court declined to specifically address the defendant's arguments but found that no order from the District Court would have been necessary for the state to pursue the defendant's voluntary surrender or an order of commitment because the stay expired by its own terms after the defendant's appeal was no longer pending. However, because the defendant's 6-month sentence was long expired by the time the state acted, the sentence could no longer be executed. The Supreme Court reversed, lifting the stay and reimposing the defendant's sentence. St. v. Nelson, 2021 MT 83, 403 Mont. 538, 484 P.3d 266.

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed With Supreme Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Amend Pleadings on Remand: Boucher filed with the Supreme Court for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court remanded to District Court for an evidentiary hearing on whether Boucher was denied effective assistance of counsel because of counsel's failure to investigate and formulate a defense based on the victim's history of making false accusations of sexual assault. On remand, Boucher sought to offer additional evidence of ineffective counsel unrelated to the issue remanded. Although a District Court has the discretion to grant or deny a motion to amend a postconviction petition when the petition is filed with that court, in cases like this when the petition is originally filed with the Supreme Court and remanded, the District Court does not have authority to grant leave to amend the pleadings to include allegations not included in the original petition. St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), distinguishing Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997), and Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

Denial of Appeal Allowed When Right to Postconviction Relief Exercised — No Due Process Violation Found: Finney argued on appeal that he had been denied his right to effective assistance of counsel. Citing Evitts v. Lucey, 469 US 387 (1985), the Supreme Court held that when, as in this case, a criminal defendant was afforded a remedy in postconviction proceedings that have already been reviewed under a different part of the Supreme Court's opinion, there is no violation of the defendant's due process rights in denial of appeal. St. v. Finney, 281 M 58, 931 P2d 1300, 54 St. Rep. 58 (1997), distinguished in Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Trial Judge's Role: Trial judge has a duty to conduct the trial in a speedy and fair manner and is allowed wide latitude in doing so. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982).

Failure to Request More Specific Instructions at Trial Level: On appeal, the defendant argued that more specific instructions were necessary. The defendant, however, did not request more specific instructions at trial. The defendant cannot on appeal hold the state or the trial court responsible for her failure to request more specific instructions. St. v. Goltz, 197 M 361, 642 P2d 1079, 39 St. Rep. 613 (1982).

Deliberate Homicide — Sufficiency of Evidence to Support Guilty Verdict: In determining on appeal whether a criminal conviction is supported by substantial evidence, the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to the State. The defendant's confession was found to have been voluntary, other evidence placed the defendant near the scene at the probable time of the murder, the defendant was unable to explain his whereabouts at the probable time of the murder, and the defendant was unable to explain his wet shoes while every witness who had been with him in the hours before the murder by drowning said the defendant had not walked near any water. This and other evidence, all viewed in the light most favorable to the State, was held sufficient to support conviction for deliberate homicide. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979); certiorari granted, Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated on, apparently, another ground and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981); affirmed on remand in St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Standing to Raise Issue on Appeal: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide in which the defendant was convicted of the lesser included offense of aggravated assault, the trial court denied defendant the opportunity to question prospective jurors on the death penalty. As defendant was not convicted of a crime for which he could be sentenced to death, under St. v. Johnson, 75 M 240, 243 P 1073 (1926), he had no standing to raise this issue on appeal. The trial court therefore did not abuse its discretion in refusing defendant's request. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER PART 3 RELATING TO RECORD ON APPEAL

Consequence of Failure to Order Transcript: Where defendant did not order the entire transcript, as required under subsection (2) of 46-20-302 (now superseded) if insufficiency of the evidence is to be argued on appeal, the defendant is precluded from asserting there was a failure of proof as to one element of the offense charged. St. v. Harvey, 219 M 402, 713 P2d 517, 43 St. Rep. 46 (1986).

Motion to Suppress Results of Breathalyzer Test Denied — Affirmed on Appeal — No Transcript Forwarded: Charged with driving under the influence of alcohol, defendant moved to suppress results of Breathalyzer test. The Justice of the Peace denied the motion. In a bench trial the Justice Court found defendant guilty. On appeal to the District Court, defendant renewed his suppression motion on a set of stipulated facts. Motion was denied and defendant was convicted by a jury of violating 61-8-406 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10), but was acquitted of charges under 61-8-401 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10). On appeal to the Supreme Court, defendant stated that no trial transcript was being forwarded since the appeal of the denial of the suppression motion could be reviewed upon the face of the stipulated facts. The state included excerpts of the trial transcript that buttressed the lower court's decision on the suppression motion. The Supreme Court approved the state's approach since the suppression motion denial was not final and could be reversed at any time. St. v. Sharp, 217 M 40, 702 P2d 959, 42 St. Rep. 1009 (1985).

Lost Trial Notes — New Trial Granted — No Double Jeopardy: The defendant did not oppose an order granting him a new trial because the court reporter lost his trial notes but alleged double jeopardy when he failed to get acquitted at the second trial. No valid double jeopardy claim existed because the defendant was not forced to accept retrial. He had available to him procedures under 46-20-304 (now superseded), albeit not totally sufficient, to appeal without benefit of an actual verbatim transcript. Allegations of violation of the right to a speedy trial were unfounded since the initial trial was timely. St. v. Hodgson, 184 M 394, 603 P2d 246 (1979).

Final Judgment Controlling Over Minute Entry: Absent special circumstances indicating otherwise, the final formal judgment as entered by the trial court controls over an inconsistent minute entry. St. v. Owens, 182 M 338, 597 P2d 72 (1979).

Record Not to Be Supplemented by Affidavits: Review is limited to the existing record, which cannot be supplemented or supplanted by affidavits filed for the first time on appeal. St. v. Tiedemann, 178 M 394, 584 P2d 1284, 35 St. Rep. 1705 (1978).

Motion for Partial Transcript: The denial of a motion for a partial transcript is proper when the movant fails to set forth the issues to be appealed. In any event, the motion is within the discretion of the court. (A 1983 amendment required a transcript of the entire proceedings.) St. v. Anderson, 171 M 188, 557 P2d 795 (1976).

Furnishing Transcript — Duty of Court Reporter: When a nonindigent defendant petitioned the court to order the official court reporter to supply him with one original copy of the transcript of his trial and to allow the defendant to supply additional copies required for appeal, the court held that the court reporter must furnish all copies because the court reporter is required to certify the correctness of each copy of the transcript. St. v. Merseal, 167 M 409, 538 P2d 1364 (1974).

Insufficient Financial Need: It would have been unconscionable to permit a proceeding in forma pauperis by a petitioner whose income for the previous year was $13,000 and who had a house, vehicles, and furniture worth over $11,000, even though the petitioner had only a small bank balance and owed over $800 in taxes. Petition of Allen, 156 M 163, 476 P2d 510 (1970).

Duty of Defense Counsel on Appeal: When the court-appointed counsel failed to advise the clerk's office as to what would be required for the record on appeal from a conviction of burglary and there was no record before the Supreme Court, the defendant had been denied his right to effective representation by counsel on his appeal and the cause was remanded to the District Court with directions to revoke appointment of the present counsel and appoint a competent and effective counsel to properly prosecute the appeal. St. v. Bubnash, 139 M 517, 366 P2d 155 (1961).

Copy of Order Constituting Judgment: An appeal by the State in a criminal prosecution from an order made at the close of the State's case in chief, directing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, was not subject to dismissal on the ground that the record on appeal did not contain a copy of the order which had all the attributes of a judgment and constituted the judgment. St. v. Thierfelder, 114 M 104, 132 P2d 1035 (1943), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Labbitt, 117 M 26, 156 P2d 163 (1945).

Record on Appeal Sufficient: On an appeal under former law from an order sustaining a demurrer to the information, the record, consisting of the information, the demurrer and the ruling thereon, the notice of appeal, a copy of the minute entries, and the certificate of the Clerk of Court, was held sufficient; no bill of exceptions was necessary since no exception was required to the ruling on the demurrer. St. v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 106 M 182, 76 P2d 81 (1938).

Insufficient Record:

The merits of an appeal in a criminal case will not be considered when the papers constituting the record are included in a bill of exceptions and not certified as the record or identified in any way by the certificate of the Clerk of the District Court or the trial judge. St. v. Farriss, 34 M 424, 87 P 177 (1906).

When the record on appeal does not contain the judgment, the appeal is subject to dismissal on motion. St. v. Mott, 29 M 292, 74 P 728 (1903).

The Supreme Court was without jurisdiction to consider an appeal when the record did not contain a copy of the notice of appeal. Butte v. Call, 23 M 94, 57 P 726 (1899).

Part 1 General Provisions

Hybrid Standard of Supreme Court Review of Sentencing When Offender Ineligible for Review by Sentence Review Division: In St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937 (1999), the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, discarding the previous two-tiered approach of reviewing sentences for both legality and abuse of discretion, which was considered a carryover from the days before the creation of the Sentence Review Division when the court reviewed all sentencing challenges. However, Montoya created a “no review” window once the Sentence Review Division came into being, which left offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions, but no term of incarceration and thus no eligibility for Sentence Review Division consideration, without a remedy. Therefore, the court fashioned a hybrid standard of review to close the “no review” window. If an offender is sentenced to 1 year or more of actual incarceration and is eligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will apply the Montoya standard and review the sentence for legality only, but if the offender is ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), followed in St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

Standard of Review of Criminal Sentence Clarified — Supreme Court Review of Legality of Sentence Only: In an effort to clear up a prevalent inconsistency in Montana case law regarding the appropriate standard of review of criminal sentences, the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, i.e., whether the sentence is within the parameters provided by statute, which in turn implies de novo review—a sentence is either legal or it is not. The court overruled St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982), St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997), and any other Montana decision that suggests that the Supreme Court will also review criminal sentences for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), followed in St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002). However, see St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), wherein the Supreme Court fashioned a hybrid standard of review for offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions but no term of incarceration who are ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division. In reviewing those sentences, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division.

Pro Se Case Appeal Filed Without Briefs — General Review of Transcript on Court’s Motion: Where the defendant made the defense of his deliberate homicide case difficult by failing to cooperate with his several attorneys, and after conviction was granted several extensions by the Supreme Court for filing a transcript and his first brief, but nevertheless failed to file a brief and specifications of error, the Supreme Court on its own motion reviewed the District Court transcript for typical kinds of errors and found: (1) that the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant’s conviction as the defendant was convicted on the basis of his own testimony; (2) that there were no errors in the jury instructions given on the evidence and the elements of the crime; (3) that assistance of counsel was adequate and that the failure of defendant’s counsel to subpoena evidence or witnesses was not relevant to the crime charged; and (4) that the statutory penalties for deliberate homicide with a dangerous weapon did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Graham, 206 M 49, 669 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 1499 (1983).

Suppression Question — Psychological Evaluation — Standard of Review: Where two expert witnesses present conflicting evidence during a suppression hearing as to results of psychological evaluations they performed of the defendant and the District Court finds one expert's testimony to be more credible than the other's, such determination will be disturbed on appeal only if it is not supported by substantial credible evidence. In re R.P.S., 188 M 317, 613 P2d 999 (1980), following St. v. Grimstad, 183 M 29, 598 P2d 198 (1979).

Objection of Defendant to Mistrial: The remedy of a criminal defendant lies in an appeal following his conviction or in a post-conviction proceeding except when the Writ of Habeas Corpus is applicable, and the Supreme Court will not suspend the rules to consider the validity of the granting of a motion for a mistrial, but the defendant must proceed in accordance with the rules to secure a prompt and fair trial. State ex rel. LaFlesch v. District Court, 165 M 302, 529 P2d 1403 (1974), overruled in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

Delay Charged to Defendant: When the appellant filed his transcript and subsequently received seven separate orders for extensions of time to file his brief, the court refused his application to vacate the hearing of the appeal. St. v. Cockrell, 130 M 552, 305 P2d 337 (1957).

Jurisdiction Over Appeals From Justices' Courts: The Supreme Court does not have appellate jurisdiction to review the judgments or orders of the Justices' Courts. State ex rel. Estes v. Justice Court, 129 M 136, 284 P2d 249 (1955).

46-20-101. Single method of review in criminal cases.

Commission Comments

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, [sections] 121-1, and 121-2.

This chapter provides a complete, simplified and speedy method of review in all criminal cases. Subsection [(2)] establishes Notice of Appeal as the sole method of review in criminal cases. However, it is not designed to limit or affect any types of review incidental to the extraordinary writs or post-conviction writs or post-conviction relief provided in Chapter [21] of this code.

Case Notes

Rules of Civil Procedure Inapplicable to Revocation Proceedings — Expiration of Time to Perfect Appeal of Sentence: The state filed a petition to revoke the defendant's probation. The District Court revoked his probation, and the defendant filed a motion for relief from a judgment pursuant to Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20). The District Court denied the motion on the basis that the Rules of Civil Procedure do not apply to revocation proceedings. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the defendant was limited to challenging the revocation through a direct appeal, the time for which had expired. St. v. Osborn, 2015 MT 48, 378 Mont. 244, 343 P.3d 1188.

Failure of Counsel to Preserve Defendant's Request for Appeal Prejudicial Per Se — Out-of-Time Appeal Appropriate Remedy: Despite a request to do so, Tweed's counsel failed to file a timely appeal of Tweed's sexual abuse conviction. Counsel did not intentionally abandon the appeal; rather, the failure was unintentional and resulted from a filing oversight and miscommunication. Nevertheless, the error was prejudicial per se and constituted ineffective assistance of counsel in violation of Tweed's constitutional rights. The failure to timely appeal was excusable, and because postconviction proceedings were considered an inadequate remedy, the Supreme Court decided that an out-of-time appeal was the appropriate remedy and, being in possession of a sufficient record, proceeded to consider the merits of the appeal. St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002), following St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Out-of-Time Appeal in Criminal Matters — Exclusive Jurisdiction With Supreme Court: Under this section, the only method for review in criminal cases is by notice of appeal. Time limits for filing an appeal are mandatory and jurisdictional. If a defendant takes no action to perfect an appeal within 90 days of judgment, the District Court loses its jurisdiction and the appeal is out-of-time. However, an out-of-time appeal is a remedy that may be available to a criminal defendant who, through no fault of the defendant, misses a deadline for filing an appeal. Although former Rule 21(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), precluded an out-of-time appeal in a civil case, the Supreme Court is not precluded from addressing a motion for an out-of-time appeal in a criminal case. Further, a District Court lacks jurisdiction to grant an out-of-time appeal. The Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction to grant a motion for an out-of-time appeal, and the motion is considered an original proceeding subject to the provisions of former Rule 17, M.R.App.P. (now superseded). Upon a showing that the failure to timely notice a criminal appeal was excusable under the circumstances, the Supreme Court may conclude that an out-of-time appeal is the appropriate remedy pursuant to former Rule 21(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded). In that event, the matter will be remanded to the District Court with instructions to vacate and reenter judgment to afford the defendant a second opportunity to act within the statutory timeframes for filing notice of appeal. St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002).

Petition for Writ to Dismiss: The remedy of an original petition for a writ to dismiss a criminal action was not available on the grounds of double jeopardy after a motion for a mistrial had been granted over the objection of the defendant and the case had been set for a new trial, since the only review in criminal cases is by notice of appeal. State ex rel. LaFlesch v. District Court, 165 M 302, 529 P2d 1403 (1974), overruled in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

46-20-103. Scope of appeal by state.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, [section] 120-1.

The present Montana Code provides for limited areas of appeal by the state in criminal cases. Subsections [(2)(a) through (c)] merely incorporate into the new code, section 94-8104 (1), (2) and (3). Subsections [(2)(d) through (g)] expand the right of appeal by the state. The dismissing of a warrant, suppressing evidence or suppressing an admission or confession, as well as changing the venue of the trial, may result in the destruction of the state's case and should be made the basis of an appeal by the state.

Subsection 4 and (5) of 94-8104 were omitted. Subsection 94-8104(4) is adequately covered by subsection 1(b) (2) and (3). Subsection 94-8104(5) providing for an appeal from an order directing the jury to find for the defendant seems unnecessary. The present code does not give the judge power to direct a verdict nor does the new code intend to give the judge this power.

Section 94-7227 gives the court the power to advise the jury to acquit. This, in effect gives the judge the power to direct a verdict and avoid an appeal since the state cannot appeal from a judgment of acquittal. It seems preferable to omit this section from the code and require the judge to grant a new trial or dismiss the case if he desires to control the outcome of the case.

Appealable Orders	1192
Nonappealable Orders	1193

GENERAL

Four-Year Mandatory Minimum Required When No Exceptions Apply: The District Court sentenced the defendant to 15 years with all but 31 days suspended for sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. The Supreme Court reversed the sentence, finding that none of the applicable exceptions to the 4-year mandatory minimum applied and that the District Court lacked statutory authority to suspend all but 31 days of the defendant's sentence. St. v. Rambold, 2014 MT 116, 375 Mont. 30, 325 P.3d 686.

Appeal by State of Criminal Conviction Proper When Defendant Faces Only Restoration of Previously Entered Guilty Verdict: When the state's appeal does not subject a defendant to the possibility of a new trial, double jeopardy concerns are absent. St. v. Finley, 2011 MT 89, 360 Mont. 173, 252 P.3d 199.

Improper Denial of State's Right to Appeal Justice's Court Suppression Motion: A Justice's Court granted Willis's motion to suppress that precluded the state from presenting statements made by Willis on the day of an accident on grounds that the state had unlawfully obtained the statements in violation of constitutional guarantees against self-incrimination. The state appealed the Justice's Court's ruling to the District Court, and the District Court granted Willis's motion to dismiss on grounds that the District Court lacked jurisdiction. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Regardless of whether the Justice's Court order suppressed evidence or a confession or admission, the state had a statutory right under 46-20-103 to appeal the Justice's Court's ruling. Trial de novo in District Court was the proper proceeding for the state's appeal pursuant to St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992), and St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987). St. v. Willis, 2008 MT 293, 345 M 402, 192 P3d 691 (2008). See also St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997).

Objection to Dismissal Not Prerequisite to State's Right to Appeal Dismissal: The state did not have to object in Justice's Court to the defendant's motion to dismiss in order to preserve the state's right to appeal the grant of the motion to the District Court. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

Trial De Novo Not Prohibited: This section merely lists those general instances in which the state may undertake an appeal from a lower court to a higher court. Nothing in the statute may be construed to prohibit trial de novo in a court of competent jurisdiction. St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987).

Trial De Novo of Criminal Case on Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Review Justice's Court Order Suppressing Evidence: A criminal case on appeal from Justice's Court to District Court must be tried anew in the District Court pursuant to 46-17-311, regardless of which party appeals. Accordingly, a District Court does not have appellate jurisdiction to review a Justice's Court order suppressing evidence. St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987), followed in St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992).

Application for Writ of Supervisory Control: An application for a Writ of Supervisory Control is an original proceeding and not an appeal. State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 173 M 221, 566 P2d 1282 (1977).

Nature of Right to Appeal — Construction:

The right of appeal in a criminal case, unknown to the common law, exists only by virtue of constitutional or statutory enactment. Statutes granting the right of appeal to the State in criminal actions must be strictly construed, and the right limited to the instances mentioned. If the right is not clearly and unequivocally conferred, an appeal does not lie, nor can the right, if conferred, be enlarged by construction of the statute. St. v. Peck, 83 M 327, 271 P 707 (1928).

The right of appeal by the State should be strictly construed and limited to those instances mentioned in the statute. St. v. Northrup, 13 M 522, 35 P 228 (1893); Territory v. Laun, 8 M 322, 20 P 652 (1889).

JUDGMENT OF ACQUITTAL

Acquittal for Mental Disease or Defect:

A judgment of acquittal on the ground of mental disease or defect excluding responsibility could not be directly appealed by the State. St. v. Nelson, 178 M 280, 583 P2d 435, 35 St. Rep. 1496 (1978).

The State had no right of direct appeal of an acquittal by reason of mental defect excluding responsibility because the defendant was not free of control by the court as in the case of a dismissal. St. v. Hagerud, 174 M 361, 570 P2d 1131 (1977).

NONAPPEALABLE DISMISSAL

Conviction in City Court — Appeal for Trial De Novo in District Court — Dismissal of Case for Insufficient Evidence by District Court — No Appeal for State: The defendant was convicted in City Court for obstructing a peace officer, disorderly conduct, and assault with a bodily fluid. She appealed to the District Court for a jury trial de novo. Following the presentation of the prosecutor's case, the District Court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss based on insufficient evidence. The state appealed to the Supreme Court, which concluded that a dismissal based on insufficient evidence is an acquittal and that the state could not appeal the dismissal from District Court because a successful appeal would subject the defendant to retrial in violation of double jeopardy principles. Cut Bank v. Hall, 2012 MT 16, 363 Mont. 380, 270 P.3d 20.

Dismissal for Insufficient Evidence Not Appealable: Where the defendants were charged with the theft of calves belonging to another and the charges were dismissed for insufficient evidence because the State did not prove the defendants' failure to give notice under 81-4-217, the dismissal of the charges could not be appealed by the State. Under the rationale of St. v. Cool, 174 M 99, 568 P2d 567 (1977) (citing U.S. v. Ball, 163 US 662 (1896), and Fong Foo v. U.S., 369 US 141, 7 L Ed 2d 629, 82 S Ct 671 (1962)), a dismissal for insufficient evidence under the circumstances of this case operates as an acquittal and an appeal constitutes a violation of the defendants' rights against double jeopardy. St. v. Greenwalt, 204 M 196, 663 P2d 1178, 40 St. Rep. 767 (1983). See also Cut Bank v. Hall, 2012 MT 16, 363 Mont. 380, 270 P.3d 20.

State Not to Appeal Justice's Court Dismissal:

When a criminal cause in Justice's Court was dismissed because a witness subpoenaed by both parties testified for the prosecution and failed to appear for the defendant, the State had no right to appeal because 46-20-103 applies only to appeals from District Court and 46-17-311 allows appeals from Justice's Court only for the defendant. St. v. Sanchez, 187 M 434, 610 P2d 162 (1980).

At the close of all the evidence, the judge granted a defense motion for a directed verdict of acquittal grounded in alleged failure of the State to present evidence sufficient as a matter of law to give the case to the jury. The judge then dismissed the case. The State had no right to appeal under this section. The court's "dismissal" was an acquittal, whatever its label. Review of an acquittal, on error or otherwise, constitutes double jeopardy. St. v. Cool, 174 M 99, 568 P2d 567 (1977).

Dismissal of Appeal After Appeal to District Court From Justice's Court:

A District Court's order of dismissal of the complaint following an appeal from a conviction in a Justice's Court did not fall within the provisions of the former section and therefore was not an appealable order. St. v. Becko, 125 M 76, 230 P2d 768 (1951).

When the defendant was convicted in a Justice's Court and appealed to the District Court, in which court the action was dismissed on the defendant's motion, the State had no right of appeal under the former section. St. v. McCluskey, 125 M 20, 229 P2d 169 (1951).

The defendant was convicted in a Justice's Court of engaging in the business of plumbing without obtaining a license. He appealed to the District Court where, after trial, the trial court entered judgment that the statute in question was unconstitutional and discharged the defendant. The State appealed. The Supreme Court held that the judgment did not fall within any of the provisions of the former section granting the State the right of appeal in a criminal case, and the appeal was dismissed. St. v. Wright, 91 M 427, 8 P2d 646 (1932).

APPEALABLE ORDERS

State Appeal of DUI Charge Dismissed Orally Prior to Written Order Not Premature: A Justice Court dismissed the charges against the defendant, who was charged with DUI. The state appealed the decision to the District Court before the Justice Court had issued a written order dismissing the charges. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that the state's appeal was premature because a written order had not yet been issued by the Justice Court. After the District Court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss, a jury convicted him of the charge. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the District Court had erred in denying his motion to dismiss. The Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that the appeal was not premature, having been filed after the Justice Court had orally dismissed the charges. St. v. Reger, 2018 MT 133, 391 Mont. 400, 419 P.3d 670.

District Court Retention of Criminal Jurisdiction — State's Appeal of Order Granting Driving Privileges Not Timely: A condition of Jivelekas's sentence for felony DUI and misdemeanor driving with a revoked or suspended license provided that Jivelekas could not drive unless approval was granted by the sentencing court or Jivelekas's supervising officer. Nearly 2 years after Jivelekas completed all terms of his sentence, he asked the District Court for approval to operate a motor vehicle in order to maintain full-time employment. The state contended that because 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) required that Jivelekas's probation officer authorize motor vehicle operation, the District Court did not have jurisdiction to consider Jivelekas's motion. The Supreme Court disagreed. Even if the District Court exceeded its statutory authority in imposing the sentence condition, the court still retained jurisdiction to entertain Jivelekas's motion. Additionally, the Supreme Court was precluded from addressing the merits of the state's argument because the state failed to file a timely appeal pursuant to former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), so the appeal was time-barred. St. v. Jivelekas, 2005 MT 277, 329 M 204, 122 P3d 1248 (2005), following Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004).

Order From Which Appeal Taken Not Required to Be Written: The District Court judge orally dismissed a criminal proceeding after he had ordered a legal intern from the courtroom because the judge considered the intern to be inappropriately attired and when the judge could not locate the appropriate criminal charge in the court file. This section authorizes the state to appeal any order or judgment that has the substantive effect of dismissing the case, whether or not the order is in writing. St. v. Schwichtenberg, 237 M 213, 772 P2d 853, 46 St. Rep. 746 (1989).

Pretrial Order Allowing Use of Evidence of Other Crimes: A pretrial order denying a motion in limine to preclude the state from using evidence of other crimes pursuant to Rule 404(b), Montana Rules of Evidence (see Title 26, ch. 10), is appealable within the scope of 46-20-103. St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986). See also St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992). T.W. and Yarns were overruled in St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997), to the extent that a pretrial order excluding evidence based on the rules of evidence, such as relevancy, probative value, or statutory inadmissibility, does not constitute an order suppressing evidence sufficient to form a statutory basis for appeal pursuant to this section.

Voir Dire Not Always Required: The State contended it was error to grant a change of venue prior to voir dire of prospective jurors to determine if an impartial jury could be selected. In this case, defense counsel's affidavit stating facts supporting a finding of alleged prejudice, copies of newspaper accounts of previous Justice's Court trial, and written report of a criminologist regarding a survey of registered voters were sufficient reasonable grounds to support a finding of widespread prejudice. It was not necessary to voir dire prospective jurors prior to granting a change of venue. St. v. Paisley, 204 M 191, 663 P2d 322, 40 St. Rep. 763 (1983).

Right of State to Appeal Denial for a Change of Venue Not Enjoyed by Defendant — No Violation of Equal Protection: Armstrong argued that it is a violation of the equal protection of the law to allow the State to appeal the denial of a request for a change of venue but to refuse that same right to a defendant. The Supreme Court said that the State has no right to appeal following a conviction or acquittal. Therefore, the allowance to the State of an interlocutory appeal for review of orders respecting place of trial, prior to conviction or acquittal, serves a purpose, that the public interest be protected in the handling of criminal cases. There is a rational basis for these appeal provisions in the statute. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341 (1980).

Interlocutory Orders: The State may appeal from an interlocutory order, and such appeals are governed by this chapter. St. v. Bergum, 164 M 155, 520 P2d 653 (1974).

Order Sustaining Demurrer to Information: Under former law, an order sustaining a demurrer to an information constituted a judgment. The former statute authorized an appeal by the State from an adverse judgment on a demurrer to the indictment or information. St. v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 106 M 182, 76 P2d 81 (1938).

Order Arresting Judgment: Regarding the substance of things, an order arresting judgment is in its nature and results a judgment for the defendant. It is a denying of a judgment to the State and a discharge and acquittal of the defendant from any possible consequences that threatened to flow from the information. St. v. Northrup, 13 M 522, 35 P 228 (1893).

NONAPPEALABLE ORDERS

Admissibility of Preliminary Alcohol Screening Test Results for Probable Cause Purposes Only — Clarification and Effect of Orders Suppressing Evidence — Grant of Motion to Exclude Inadmissible Evidence Not Considered Order Suppressing Evidence: The state sought to have the results of a preliminary alcohol screening test admitted into evidence in a DUI case. The City Court denied the motion, and the state immediately appealed to District Court, contending that in denying the motion, the City Court had suppressed evidence and that the statutory 6-month limit on trial of misdemeanors in 46-13-401 was thus exhausted. The Supreme Court noted that the results of a preliminary alcohol screening test pursuant to 61-8-409 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) are not substantive evidence of the amount of alcohol present in a person's body but instead are an estimate of alcohol concentration only for the purpose of establishing probable cause to believe that a person is under the influence of alcohol prior to making an arrest. An order that suppresses evidence is an order that excludes evidence on the grounds that the evidence was illegally obtained and does not include a pretrial order that excludes evidence based on rules of evidence, such as relevancy, probative value, or statutory inadmissibility. Thus, the City Court order excluding preliminary alcohol screening test results was not an order suppressing evidence but rather an order determining that the results were not substantive evidence at all; therefore, there was no statutory basis under subsection (2)(e) of this section for appeal to District Court. Because City Court jurisdiction was not exhausted by some action authorizing appeal to the District Court, 46-13-401(2) was not satisfied and defendant, who made no move to postpone, was entitled to dismissal of the DUI charge with prejudice pursuant to 46-13-401(2) on grounds that he had not received a timely trial. St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997), following St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532 (1986), and St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), overruling inconsistent holdings in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428 (1986), and St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543 (1992), and followed, with regard to limited admissibility of preliminary breath test evidence, in St. v. Weldele, 2003 MT

117, 315 M 452, 69 P3d 1162 (2003). See also St. v. Crawford, 2003 MT 118, 315 M 480, 68 P3d 848 (2003), and St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 334, 324 M 173, 103 P3d 503 (2004).

Admission of Evidence Under Rape Shield Law — Proper Use of Supervisory Control: The Attorney General petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control in a case in which the District Court had ruled that certain evidence of prior sexual conduct by the victim was admissible in a case charging sexual intercourse without consent. The Supreme Court accepted original jurisdiction of the case, holding that it was a proper case for supervisory control because: (1) once the testimony on prior sexual conduct is given in open court, the injury that the rape shield law was intended to prevent has already occurred; and (2) under 46-20-103, evidentiary rulings under the rape shield law may not be appealed. State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 277 M 349, 922 P2d 474, 53 St. Rep. 678 (1996).

Refusal by Trial Court to Rule on Admissibility of Suppressed Evidence for Impeachment Purposes — No Error: The state asked the District Court to rule that defendant's statements that had been suppressed from the case in chief could nevertheless be used for impeachment because impeachment is a collateral use to which the exclusionary rule does not apply. When the District Court took the matter under advisement, the state sought to compel the Supreme Court to rule on the issue prior to trial. However, nothing in this section expressly guarantees the state the right to have a lower court suppression ruling in time to perfect an appeal. The power to grant or deny pretrial motions is within the sound discretion of the District Court. Absent a District Court ruling, the impeachment issue was not properly before the Supreme Court. St. v. Moore, 250 M 254, 818 P2d 835, 48 St. Rep. 913 (1991), distinguishing St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532 (1986).

Adverse Evidentiary Ruling Not Suppression of Evidence: A District Court order, sustaining objection to the admission of blood sample analyses in a DUI negligent homicide case because the state could not show a proper chain of custody of the samples, does not constitute a suppression of evidence under subsection (2)(e) of this section and therefore is not an appealable order. St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532, 43 St. Rep. 54 (1986), distinguished in St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992).

Order Setting Aside Information: Under former law, an appeal could not be taken by the State from an order setting aside an information. St. v. O'Brien, 20 M 191, 50 P 412 (1897).

Order Made After Judgment: Under former law, the State could not appeal from an order of the District Court sustaining a defendant's plea of former acquittal and jeopardy after the reversal of a conviction for manslaughter under an indictment charging murder in the first degree. St. v. O'Brien, 19 M 6, 47 P 103 (1896).

46-20-104. Scope of appeal by defendant.

Commission Comments

Source: M.R.App.P.—[former] Rule 2 [now superseded].

Subsection [(7)] avoids an appeal that might not be necessary because the ultimate decision might be favorable to the defendant (e.g., an appeal from an order to suppress evidence).

[Subsection (2)] also broadens the scope of appeal in one respect. Under the present code it is necessary to make a motion for a new trial and then appeal from an adverse ruling if the grounds of appeal are also the grounds for a motion for a new trial. No such requirement is intended to be imposed by this code. All questions heretofore raised on such an appeal may be raised on appeal from the judgment regardless of whether a motion for a new trial has been made in the trial court. Also, in regard to the limitations on appeal imposed by this section it must be kept in mind that other post-conviction proceedings have been provided for in Chapter [21] Post Conviction Hearing. Both this Chapter and Chapter [21], Post Conviction Hearing, provide the defendant with the necessary machinery to obtain relief from an illegal conviction. It is the purpose of Subsection [(2)] to provide one complete, full and adequate review by enlarging the power of the reviewing court. This is accomplished by allowing the court to decide all questions raised by the entire proceeding, below, including an appeal from a motion for a new trial.

It is intended that this section be supplemented by the extensive post conviction remedy.

1983 Amendment: In (2), substituted "alleged error" for "order or decision"; and inserted last sentence making failure to timely object at trial a waiver of the objection.

Appeal of Warrantless Recording of Conversation — Submission at Any Time Case Not Yet Final: Prior to a sentencing hearing for a drug conviction by a jury based in part on the warrantless recording of conversations by an informant, the defendant appealed the admission of the recordings based upon the Supreme Court’s ruling on warrantless recordings in St. v. Goetz, 2008 MT 296, 345 Mont. 421, 191 P.3d 489. The District Court denied the motion based on the Supreme Court’s decisions in St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008 MT 397, 347 Mont. 164, 197 P.3d 1004, and St. v. Foston, 2009 MT 191, 351 Mont. 85, 209 P.3d 262, that to be similarly situated as the defendant in Goetz so as to justify a retroactive application of Goetz the defendant must have objected to the recording prior to or during the trial. The Supreme Court reversed its decisions in Foster-DeBerry and Foston and held that a defendant would be considered similarly situated as the defendant in Goetz so long as the defendant’s case is pending, on direct review, or not yet final. St. v. Reichmand, 2010 MT 228, 358 Mont. 68, 243 P.3d 423.

Date Defendant Sentenced In Absentia Considered Date of Legally Effective Sentence for Appeal Purposes: Clark was charged with a misdemeanor traffic violation but failed to appear for trial and was tried, convicted, and sentenced by the Municipal Court in absentia pursuant to 46-16-123 on June 12, 2006. A warrant was issued for failure to appear, and Clark appeared before a different Municipal Court on July 14, 2006, and was informed of the June sentence. Clark sought to appeal to District Court, but the District Court dismissed the appeal on grounds that it was untimely. On appeal to the Supreme Court, Clark argued that dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was in error because the period for filing a Municipal Court appeal should have begun on July 14 when he was informed of the June sentence, rather than June 12 when the sentence was actually imposed. The Supreme Court disagreed. A valid sentence was imposed on June 12 and was not subject to postponement or modification until Clark appeared on the bench warrant. By Municipal Court Rule, Clark had until June 26 to file an appeal, but the appeal was not filed until July 28 and was therefore untimely and was properly dismissed by the District Court. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 317, 346 M 80, 193 P3d 934 (2008). See also St. v. Bonamarte, 2006 MT 291, 334 M 376, 147 P3d 220 (2006).

Failure to Preserve Issue for Appeal by Failure to Object at Trial — Plain Error Review Inappropriate Absent Implication of Defendant's Fundamental Rights: At Price’s trial for assault with a weapon, a stun gun, the trial court allowed evidence of Price’s prior conviction for intimidation. Following conviction, Price appealed on grounds that the evidence was improperly introduced because the state failed to give notice of the intent to introduce other crimes evidence in violation of Price’s due process rights. The state contended that Price waived the right to appeal the issue by failing to object to introduction of the evidence and by actively participating in its introduction. The Supreme Court declined to review the issue because Price failed to object to the evidence at trial and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal. Further, plain error review was inappropriate because Price’s fundamental constitutional rights were not implicated by introduction of the evidence. St. v. Price, 2007 MT 269, 339 M 399, 171 P3d 293 (2007), followed in St. v. Stearns, 2008 MT 356, 346 M 348, 195 P3d 794 (2008), and St. v. Thorp, 2010 MT 92, 356 Mont. 150, 231 P.3d 1096.

Remand or Order to Lift Stay Unnecessary Upon Affirmation by Appellate Court — Supreme Court Jurisdiction of Municipal Court Appeal Affirmed but Remanded by District Court: A Municipal Court sentenced Costa for misdemeanor traffic offenses, then stayed imposition of sentence pending Costa’s appeal to District Court. The District Court affirmed judgment and remanded to the Municipal Court for imposition of sentence. The question then arose as to whether the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to address the District Court’s decision. The Supreme Court noted that the definition of remand is to send something back for further action; however, the Legislature did not intend to require an appellate court to formally remand in cases involving affirmed criminal judgments. In addition, it is unnecessary for an appellate court to direct that a stay pending appeal be lifted once a defendant has exhausted the right to appeal and the underlying judgment and sentence have been affirmed. Therefore, the District Court’s remand was premature, unnecessary, and of no immediate consequence and had no effect on the Municipal Court's final judgment and sentence. The Municipal Court stayed Costa's sentence pending appeal, which presumably encompassed an appeal to the Supreme Court, so because the District Court's remand was unnecessary, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction over Costa's appeal. Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006).

No Supreme Court Jurisdiction to Hear Appeal Absent Final Judgment: Reeder was convicted of DUI in Municipal Court. Reeder appealed to District Court, raising 22 issues. The District Court found that Reeder's due process rights were not violated, but held that the Municipal Court erroneously admitted the results of an Intoxilyzer test without proper foundation and remanded for a new trial. Reeder appealed the District Court's decision and raised other issues not addressed by the District Court. The Supreme Court held that because Reeder did not currently stand convicted of a criminal offense and because no final judgment of conviction had been entered, the Supreme Court lacked jurisdiction to hear the case, so the appeal was dismissed. St. v. Reeder, 2004 MT 244, 323 M 15, 97 P3d 1104 (2004).

Record-Based Claims of Ineffective Counsel for Failure to Object Considered on Direct Appeal and Denied: Daniels claimed on direct appeal that he was denied effective assistance of counsel because defense counsel failed to investigate and interview certain witnesses in order to present a case in chief and failed to object to certain trial testimony. The state responded that Daniels could not demonstrate that counsel's actions were not objectively reasonable or that there was a reasonable possibility that counsel's errors caused a prejudicial result. The Supreme Court noted that Daniels' claims concerning failure to investigate were not record-based and thus not subject to review on direct appeal, pursuant to Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), and St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001). Regarding the record-based claims of failure to object, the court agreed with the state. The evidence in question was admissible, so counsel was not required to object and could not be considered ineffective for failing to do so. Absent a showing of counsel's deficient performance, Daniels' conviction was affirmed. St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003).

District Court Review of Denial of Right to Speedy Trial in Justice's Court — Exception to Trial De Novo: As a general rule, the District Court must try all appeals from Justice's Court de novo and may not sit as a court of review. To ensure a defendant's adequate remedy at law, there is an exception to the general rule if the error complained of is lack of a speedy trial in Justice's Court because that error cannot be cured by trial de novo. Thus, the District Court may rule on a Justice's Court's denial of a motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial in the event that the defendant timely appeals the Justice's Court conviction and sentence to the District Court and raises the speedy trial issue as part of the appeal. State ex rel. Wilson v. District Court, 270 M 449, 893 P2d 318, 52 St. Rep. 264 (1995).

Judgment and Sentence Prerequisite to Appeal to District Court — Misdemeanors: Except for misdemeanors listed in 3-5-302(2), a District Court is limited to appellate jurisdiction of misdemeanor cases. Imposition of sentence and entry of a final judgment by a Justice's Court or City Court are prerequisites to appeal to a District Court, and a party may not consent to subject matter jurisdiction or waive the want of jurisdiction. St. v. Hegeman, 248 M 49, 808 P2d 509, 48 St. Rep. 318 (1991), followed in St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996), and St. v. Diesen, 1998 MT 163, 290 M 55, 964 P2d 712, 55 St. Rep. 655 (1998).

Right of State to Appeal Denial for a Change of Venue Not Enjoyed by Defendant — No Violation of Equal Protection: Armstrong argued that it is a violation of the equal protection of the law to allow the State to appeal the denial of a request for a change of venue but to refuse that same right to a defendant. The Supreme Court said that the State has no right to appeal following a conviction or acquittal. Therefore, the allowance to the State of an interlocutory appeal for review of orders respecting place of trial, prior to conviction or acquittal, serves a purpose, that the public interest be protected in the handling of criminal cases. There is a rational basis for these appeal provisions in the statute. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341 (1980).

Deliberate Homicide — Sufficiency of Evidence to Support Guilty Verdict: In determining on appeal whether a criminal conviction is supported by substantial evidence, the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to the State. The defendant's confession was found to have been voluntary, other evidence placed the defendant near the scene at the probable time of the murder, the defendant was unable to explain his whereabouts at the probable time of the murder, and the defendant was unable to explain his wet shoes while every witness who had been with him in the hours before the murder by drowning said the defendant had not walked near any water. This and other evidence, all viewed in the light most favorable to the State, was held sufficient to support conviction for deliberate homicide. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979); certiorari granted, Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated on, apparently, another ground and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981); affirmed on remand in St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Guilty Plea: The issue of suppression of evidence is a matter of defense at trial and may become an issue upon appeal; but when a guilty plea has been entered, the defendant is convicted upon his plea of guilty and not upon the evidence. St. v. Turcotte, 164 M 426, 524 P2d 787 (1974).

Denial of Petition for Writ of Error Coram Nobis: Leave to file an appeal from a denial of a petition for a Writ of Error Coram Nobis by the District Court was denied by the Supreme Court since no leave to file an appeal is required under the law and if an appeal was available from the District Court order, the time therefor had not expired. Brown v. St., 140 M 289, 371 P2d 262 (1962).

Perfecting Appeal While New Trial Motion Pending: The act of the defendant in a criminal prosecution in perfecting an appeal from the judgment of conviction while his motion for a new trial was pending did not deprive the trial court of jurisdiction thereafter to pass upon the motion, or the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to consider the subsequent appeal from the order denying the new trial. St. v. Harkins, 85 M 585, 281 P 551 (1929).

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Hybrid Standard of Supreme Court Review of Sentencing When Offender Ineligible for Review by Sentence Review Division: In St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937 (1999), the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, discarding the previous two-tiered approach of reviewing sentences for both legality and abuse of discretion, which was considered a carryover from the days before the creation of the Sentence Review Division when the court reviewed all sentencing challenges. However, Montoya created a "no review" window once the Sentence Review Division came into being, which left offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions, but no term of incarceration and thus no eligibility for Sentence Review Division consideration, without a remedy. Therefore, the court fashioned a hybrid standard of review to close the "no review" window. If an offender is sentenced to 1 year or more of actual incarceration and is eligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will apply the Montoya standard and review the sentence for legality only, but if the offender is ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), followed in St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

Standard of Review of Criminal Sentence Clarified — Supreme Court Review of Legality of Sentence Only: In an effort to clear up a prevalent inconsistency in Montana case law regarding the appropriate standard of review of criminal sentences, the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, i.e., whether the sentence is within the parameters provided by statute, which in turn implies de novo review—a sentence is either legal or it is not. The court overruled St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982), St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997), and any other Montana decision that suggests that the Supreme Court will also review criminal sentences for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), followed in St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002). However, see St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), wherein the Supreme Court fashioned a hybrid standard of review for offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions but no term of incarceration who are ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division. In reviewing those sentences, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division.

NONAPPEALABLE ISSUES

Sentence Pending — Appeal Premature: Defendant was convicted in Municipal Court of partner or family member assault and sentenced to 1 year with all but 30 days suspended. The sentence also included restitution, conditioned upon the state requesting it or the expiration of a 60-day period. Before either condition occurred, defendant appealed, and the record was transferred to the District Court. Defendant argued in District Court that the restitution order should be stricken, but the judgment and sentence were affirmed. However, the restitution portion was remanded to the Municipal Court. Defendant appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court held that because neither sentencing condition had occurred when defendant appealed to the District Court, defendant's sentence was not yet final, so the appeal to the District Court was premature and the District Court had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. Moreover, defendant could not cure the jurisdictional defect by ignoring the restitution issue on appeal to the Supreme Court. Because the restitution issue was still pending, defendant's judgment was not final, and the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction to consider the appeal. The Supreme Court noted that defendant's notice of appeal should be considered timely and that defendant's right to appeal should not be prejudiced because of the District Court's error in taking premature jurisdiction over the case and deciding it in piecemeal fashion. St. v. Bonamarte, 2006 MT 291, 334 M 376, 147 P3d 220 (2006).

Generalized Motion In Limine Insufficient to Preserve Appeal of Issue of Admissibility of Specific Prior Bad Conduct Absent Objection: Vukasin's generalized motion in limine to exclude evidence of prior crimes and bad acts was granted. Vukasin later contended that the prosecution introduced improper witness testimony of prior violent conduct that was prejudicial and prevented a fair trial. The Supreme Court noted that while a motion in limine may preserve a specification of error for appeal, the mere act of filing the motion does not negate the obligation to object and to make the basis and grounds for the objection clear to the trial court and that a trial court will not be put in error when that court does not have the opportunity to rule on the admissibility of the evidence and to correct itself. Here, Vukasin made no objection when the evidence was introduced, nor was the broad motion in limine specific enough in itself as to the basis for an objection. The motion did not identify either the specific witness or testimony to which Vukasin later objected on appeal, so the trial court was not alerted by the motion that Vukasin was objecting to the testimony given. Thus, the motion was a generalized objection that did not preserve the evidentiary issue, so appeal of the issue was waived. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), followed in St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005), and St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006). See also St. v. Stuit, 277 M 227, 921 P2d 866 (1996).

No Authority to Appeal Justice's Court Order Denying Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: The Feights got into a fight with a highway patrol officer at a high school basketball game and were charged with misdemeanor assault. They were informed of their rights in Justice's Court, waived their right to counsel, and pleaded guilty. More than a month later, they moved through counsel to withdraw their guilty pleas, claiming good cause under 46-16-105. The Justice's Court denied the motion, holding that the Feights had been given due process and had voluntarily, knowingly, and willingly entered guilty pleas. The Feights appealed the denial of their motion to withdraw their guilty pleas to District Court. The state moved to dismiss the appeal, contending that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to review denial of the motion to withdraw a plea. The District Court dismissed the appeal but remanded to Justice's Court with a recommendation that the Feights be allowed to withdraw their pleas. Instead, the Justice's Court reinstated judgment, and the Feights appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed. The statutes that provide for and determine the jurisdiction of a District Court to entertain an appeal from a Justice's Court include 3-5-303, 46-12-204, 46-17-203, and 46-17-311. However, none of these statutes provide authority for appeal to the District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. Further, the specific language of these sections prevails over the general language in this section defining the scope of appeal by a criminal defendant. The Legislature has not created a statutory right of appeal from a Justice's Court denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, and the Supreme Court refrained from creating one. St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Rogers, 267 M 190, 883 P2d 115 (1994), and followed in St. v. Fox, 2001 MT 209, 306 M 353, 34 P3d 484 (2001).

Denial of Bond Pending Appeal — Method of Supreme Court Review — Jurisdiction: After conviction for negligent homicide and on related charges, Ingraham moved the District Court to continue bond pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion, finding that Ingraham was a danger to the community and therefore did not meet the requirements of 46-9-107. Ingraham then moved the Supreme Court, pursuant to former Rule 22, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to continue bond pending appeal or, in the alternative, to accept appeal of the District Court's order denying bond, pursuant to former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and this section. The Attorney General moved to dismiss, contending that there was no provision in law for appeal from a District Court order denying bond pending appeal and that Ingraham should have brought an original habeas corpus proceeding. The Supreme Court agreed with the Attorney General and dismissed Ingraham's motion or appeal, holding that Ingraham should have brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 46-22-103. Ingraham then filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which was filed with Justice Trieweller pursuant to 3-2-212. Justice Trieweller granted the petition to the extent necessary for the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing as provided by statute, under the theory that the District Court was the more appropriate court for the hearing than was the Supreme Court. The Attorney General opposed the order by applying to the full Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, arguing, contrary to the state's previous position, that 46-22-103 does not really apply to persons convicted in a criminal case and that the more appropriate procedure was an original proceeding "in the nature of habeas corpus" before the full Supreme Court. The application for a writ of supervisory control was denied, was treated by the Supreme Court as a late-filed response to Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and was referred to Justice Trieweller. Justice Trieweller determined that it was inappropriate for him alone to determine the form of review of the District Court's denial of bond. Justice Trieweller also determined that: (1) Ingraham had no constitutional right to bond pending appeal; (2) Ingraham did have a right to the proper exercise of the District Court's discretion in the application of 46-9-107; and (3) that right was a substantial right for the purposes of this section. For these reasons, Justice Trieweller vacated his previous order granting Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and referred the matter to the full Supreme Court for review of the District Court's order denying bond pending appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

No Appeal, Based on Constitutionality of Offense Charged, From Judgment of Not Guilty by Reason of Mental Disease or Defect: Kaplan was charged with seven counts of stalking under 45-5-220, arising from her repeated contact with her former martial arts instructor. Kaplan moved to dismiss the charges on grounds that 45-5-220 is unconstitutional. Following a briefing, the motion was denied. By stipulation, Kaplan was subsequently found not guilty by reason of mental disease or defect. Because Kaplan was not convicted, there was no judgment of conviction from which to appeal. Therefore, the denial of her motion to dismiss, absent a judgment of conviction, was not itself an appealable order. The proper method of challenging a finding of mental disease or defect is found in 46-14-301 through 46-14-303. Appealing the constitutionality of the statute under which the person was charged is not an option. St. v. Kaplan, 275 M 108, 910 P2d 240, 53 St. Rep. 60 (1996), followed in St. v. Violette, 2009 MT 19, 349 M 81, 201 P3d 804 (2009).

Judgment as Including Sentence — Sentence Not Strictly Premised on Punishment: A defendant had 60 days under former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to appeal a final judgment. Although prior to the 1991 enactment of 46-1-202, "sentence" was interpreted as being the same as "punishment", 46-1-202 now defines a sentence as any judicial disposition of a criminal proceeding upon a plea, verdict, or finding of guilt. The judicial disposition is itself a sentence regardless of whether actual punishment is deferred or imposed immediately. This broader definition applies to deferment cases, but in double jeopardy cases, the narrower meaning premised on the punishment factor still applies. Therefore, a judgment that includes a deferred sentence is final for purposes of appeal, and an appeal filed more than 60 days after sentencing was dismissed as untimely. St. v. Rice, 275 M 81, 910 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 48 (1996), followed in Davis v. St., 2004 MT 112, 321 M 118, 88 P3d 1285 (2004).

Resetting Execution Date Not Considered Appealable Judgment — Setting Execution Date as Ministerial Rather Than Judicial Act: McKenzie was sentenced for deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping, and the death penalty was imposed in 1975. Despite the subsequent process of appeals spanning nearly 20 years, the 1975 sentence was never vacated by any court. The District Court held a hearing in 1995 to reset the execution date after the appeals proceedings, none of which were ultimately successful for McKenzie, had run their course. McKenzie claimed that the hearing constituted a resentencing that reimposed the death sentence, which was beyond the jurisdiction of the District Court. The Supreme Court noted that setting the execution date was a ministerial function rather than a judicial act. Because McKenzie's substantial rights could not be implicated by that ministerial act, the District Court's order resetting the execution date could not be defined as a new judgment from which an appeal could lie. The District Court merely executed the judgment before it. Further, under St. v. Hanners, 254 M 524, 839 P2d 1267 (1992), once the valid judgment and sentence had been signed, the District Court had no jurisdiction to vacate the original judgment except as provided by law. Montana has no law allowing amendment of an original judgment at a hearing resetting an execution date. St. v. McKenzie, 271 M 32, 894 P2d 289, 52 St. Rep. 312 (1995).

Order Denying Application for Writ of Certiorari Proper Absent Final Judgment: Wilson appealed to the District Court regarding denial of her application for a writ of certiorari for review of a Justice's Court's ruling denying her motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial in connection with a DUI prosecution that was not completed. However, Wilson was entitled to an appeal only from a final judgment of conviction and from orders after a judgment that affected her substantial rights. Because she was never sentenced, there was no final judgment from which she could appeal. The District Court correctly determined that the speedy trial issue could be raised in connection with Wilson's appeal from Justice's Court to District Court and that denial of the application for a writ of certiorari was proper. State ex rel. Wilson v. District Court, 270 M 449, 893 P2d 318, 52 St. Rep. 264 (1995).

Defense Strategy Not Proper Basis for Appeal: A defendant's decisions in defense strategy do not form a proper basis for an appeal. St. v. Larson, 266 M 28, 878 P2d 886, 51 St. Rep. 638 (1994).

Alleged Error in Instruction Given at Defendant's Request: The Supreme Court would not consider an alleged error in an instruction that was given at defendant's request. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Order Denying Petition for Writ of Prohibition: An order of the District Court denying the petition of the defendant for a Writ of Prohibition to restrain a Justice's Court from further proceedings in a criminal action was not a judgment and could not be appealed. State ex rel. Aho v. Justice Court, 131 M 585, 313 P2d 542 (1957).

ISSUES PRESERVED FOR APPEAL

No Record of Why Counsel Disclosed Neurologist as Lay Witness — Ineffective Assistance Claim Not Appropriate for Direct Appeal: The defendant was convicted of felony theft by insurance fraud. On direct appeal, the defendant argued he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney had disclosed a neurologist as a lay witness rather than an expert. The Supreme Court held that the record did not explain why the defendant's attorney chose not to offer the neurologist as an expert witness and dismissed the claim without prejudice, allowing the defendant to raise the claim in a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Schaeffer, 2014 MT 47, 374 Mont. 93, 321 P.3d 809.

Only Record-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim on Appeal: Frasure claimed on appeal that her attorney provided ineffective assistance at trial by failing to object to the introduction of certain evidence. However, the Supreme Court will determine that there was ineffective assistance of counsel only if that conclusion can be based on the record on appeal or if there is no plausible justification for counsel's actions or inactions. Frasure failed to establish that her ineffective assistance claim was record-based, so the claim was dismissed without prejudice to the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 305, 323 M 479, 100 P3d 1013 (2004). See also St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003), St. v. Baker, 2013 MT 113, 370 Mont. 43, 300 P.3d 696, St. v. Olson, 2014 MT 8, 373 Mont. 262, 317 P.3d 159, and St. v. Hinshaw, 2018 MT 49, 390 Mont. 372, 414 P.3d 271.

Failure of Defense Counsel to Question Defendant's Mental Condition During Sentencing — Alleged Errors in Attorney Performance Properly Resolved in Postconviction Relief Proceeding: Watson petitioned for postconviction relief and claimed that defense counsel provided inadequate assistance at sentencing by not questioning whether Watson suffered from a mental disease or defect. The District Court denied the petition, determining that the ineffective assistance claim was record-based and should have been raised on direct appeal. In St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001), the Supreme Court outlined a two-step process for determining whether ineffective assistance claims should have been raised on appeal or in a postconviction hearing. First, the trial record must adequately document a challenged act or omission of defense counsel for a defendant to raise an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Second, the record on appeal must afford sufficient understanding of the reasons for counsel's act or omission to answer the threshold question of whether the alleged error expressed a trial strategy or tactical decision, and if the record does not supply the reason for counsel's act or omission, the claim must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. Here, the record was devoid of any evidence as to why counsel did not question Watson's mental condition, so Watson could not have properly raised an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Therefore, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for an evidentiary postconviction hearing to determine whether counsel's act or omission was a trial strategy or tactical decision. Watson v. St., 2002 MT 329, 313 M 209, 61 P3d 759 (2002), following Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). See also Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002).

Motion In Limine Sufficient to Preserve Objection for Appeal: Defendant's motion in limine to exclude testimony regarding certain chemicals in his blood and bottles of prescription medication found in his car was sufficient to preserve the objection for appeal. The propriety of the admission of the evidence is a proper issue for the Supreme Court on appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P.2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998). See also St. v. Byrne, 2021 MT 238, 405 Mont. 352, 495 P.3d 440.

Alford Plea in Sexual Assault Case — Revocation of Suspended Sentence: In a sexual assault case, the defendant sufficiently raised the issue of the fifth amendment right against self-incrimination to warrant review on appeal. The defendant entered an Alford plea, and sexual offender evaluation and treatment were conditions of the suspended sentence. The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it revoked the defendant's suspended sentence for violations of the conditions of the suspended sentence, including sexual offender evaluation and treatment. St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P.2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995).

Denial of Motion for Mistrial: The part of the defendant's appeal claiming that the trial court erred in denying a motion of the defendant for a mistrial was properly before the Supreme Court when it was taken within the time allowed by statute. St. v. Tiedemann, 139 M 237, 362 P.2d 529 (1961).

ISSUES NOT RAISED IN LOWER COURT

Failure to Object at Trial — District Court's Failure to Rule on Motion In Limine — Prosecutor's Comments Shifting Burden Harmless Error: The defendant was arrested, charged, and convicted of driving under the influence after refusing to give a breath test. Prior to the trial, she moved in limine to prohibit the state from shifting the burden of proof by arguing that she could have proven her innocence by taking a breath test. The District Court failed to rule on the motion. At trial, the prosecution argued that the defendant could have proved her innocence by submitting to a breath test; however, the defendant failed to object. On appeal, the defendant argued that the motion to prohibit the state's comments preserved her objection and that the comments prejudiced the jury. The Supreme Court disagreed with the defendant, holding that the District Court failed to provide a definitive ruling and the motion did not preserve the objection, that she failed to object at trial, and that while the state's comments were improper, the evidence indicated that it did not rise to the level of plain error. St. v. Favel, 2015 MT 336, 381 Mont. 472, 362 P.3d 1126. See also St. v. Wellknown, 2022 MT 95, 408 Mont. 411, 510 P.3d 84.

Jury Deliberation Adjournment — Right to Presence — Jury Pool Procedures — Failure to Timely Object: Plain error review was inappropriate in a theft and trespass appeal concerning multiple issues that the defendants failed to raise in the trial court. The defendants moved for a mistrial based on a 3-week adjournment in jury deliberations, but a motion for a new trial does not take the place of a timely objection. On appeal, the defendants also objected based on the defendants' right to be present at critical stages of the trial, but the defendants did not object during the trial when the judge briefly stepped into the hallway with witnesses and jurors to conduct an inquiry into whether there was inappropriate contact between the witnesses and jurors and then immediately reported back on his findings. Last, the defense stipulated that the jury was properly summoned and selected during trial and failed to timely object during the sentencing phase when put on notice that three individuals who were not county residents had been called to serve in the jury pool but did not serve on the jury and were not the subject of peremptory challenge. St. v. Robertson, 2014 MT 279, 376 Mont. 471, 336 P.3d 367.

Sentence Not Reviewed — Failure to Timely Raise Issue — No Error Regarding Fundamental Constitutional Rights: On appeal, the defendant asserted that the prosecutor breached a plea agreement at the District Court level during sentencing. The Supreme Court declined to consider the claimed error because it was not advanced in District Court and raised no question concerning fundamental fairness of the trial court proceeding; a party may not change its theory on appeal from that advanced in the trial court or raise an argument for the first time on appeal. St. v. Lewis, 2012 MT 157, 365 Mont. 431, 282 P.3d 679.

Attorney's Failure to Object to Multiple Charges — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Goodenough alleged that he received ineffective assistance of counsel on the basis that his counsel should have objected under 46-11-410 to his conviction or sentence for both sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault. Goodenough did not object at the District Court level and is not entitled to raise the issue on appeal. In addition, Goodenough did not receive ineffective assistance of counsel because the facts and evidence supported separate charges that did not constitute a single transaction. St. v. Goodenough, 2010 MT 247, 358 Mont. 219, 245 P.3d 14, distinguishing St. v. Williams, 2010 MT 58, 355 Mont. 354, 228 P.3d 1127.

Failure to Object to Prosecutor's Comment During Closing Argument — Waiver of Issue on Appeal: Misner moved for a new trial on grounds that his counsel was ineffective by failing to object to the prosecutor's comments during closing arguments. The trial court determined that the comments were appropriate references to and reasonable inferences from the evidence, and the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. An attorney may argue and draw reasonable inferences from evidence if facts support the statements, and the prosecutor's inferences that Misner staged the crime scene were reasonable given the blood spatter evidence. There was no reasonable possibility that had Misner's counsel objected to the prosecutor's remarks in closing arguments, the result of the proceeding would have been different, so Misner was not prejudiced, and the ineffective assistance claim was without merit. St. v. Misner, 2007 MT 235, 339 M 176, 168 P3d 679 (2007), following St. v. Grace, 2001 MT 22, 304 M 144, 18 P3d 1008 (2001).

Failure to Raise Legal Theory Regarding Juror Misconduct at Trial: After being convicted of two counts of incest, Rennaker raised for the first time on appeal a new legal theory regarding juror misconduct. The Supreme Court, citing St. v. Courville, 2002 MT 330, 313 M 218, 61 P3d 749 (2002), held that even though Rennaker had raised the issue of juror misconduct in the trial court and submitted several affidavits from other jurors regarding that misconduct, his raising of the new theory, that the misconduct affected the jurors' impartiality or contaminated the jury pool, for the first time on appeal would not be considered by the court. St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

Effect of Alford Plea on Subsequent Appeals — Request to Withdraw Alford Plea to Be Made in District Court: Hoots entered an Alford plea to DUI charges and later sought to withdraw the plea on appeal, contending that the plea was made only because Hoots was forced to plead guilty after the trial court denied a request for new counsel. However, Hoots did not request to withdraw the plea at any time during the District Court proceedings. Because a motion to withdraw an Alford plea must be made in District Court, the Supreme Court declined to address the issue on appeal. St. v. Hoots, 2005 MT 346, 330 M 144, 127 P3d 369 (2005), following St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908 (1995).

Ineffective Counsel Claims Insufficient to Invoke Plain Error Doctrine on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Novak contended that his counsel's failure to object to certain prejudicial, inadmissible evidence compromised his right to a fair trial and asserted that the Supreme Court should apply the plain error doctrine to review counsel's failure. The Supreme Court held that all of the alleged errors were encompassed in Novak's effective assistance of counsel claim, which could be raised in postconviction proceedings, but were insufficient to invoke the plain error doctrine on direct appeal. St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005).

Review of Legality of Imposing Restitution — Failure to Raise Issue Below: If a defendant appeals a sentence in a criminal case on the grounds that it is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, the issue may be reviewed even if no objection was made at the time of sentencing. Therefore, defendant's claim that an order to pay restitution as a condition to a suspended sentence was illegal was not waived by his failure to raise the issue below and would be reviewed on appeal. St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004).

Failure to Provide Proof of Entitlement to Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied: Ellenburg raised several issues on appeal, some of which were raised in District Court and some of which were not. The Supreme Court declined to address all issues that were not preserved for appeal. Several other issues were procedurally barred because Ellenburg either raised them on direct appeal or reasonably could have raised them on direct appeal. Postconviction relief was denied on the remaining issues because Ellenburg waived the right to appeal those issues by failing to provide any evidentiary support for the allegations. The petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), following St. v. Schmalz, 1998 MT 210, 290 M 420, 964 P2d 763 (1998), St. v. Niederklopper, 2000 MT 187, 300 M 397, 6 P3d 448 (2000), and St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), and followed in Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Failure of Trial Court to Hold Hearing Regarding Juror's Acquaintance With Witness — Waiver Absent Timely Objection — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: During voir dire at Davis's trial, several jurors indicated that they were acquainted with two witnesses but stated that their acquaintance would not affect their ability to sit as jurors. Immediately after the first witness was called, a juror stated to the court that he knew the witness. Without objection from Davis, the court noted the statement and the witness proceeded to testify. Following conviction, Davis appealed on grounds that the court should have held a hearing to determine whether the juror was biased and that failure to do so violated Davis's right to an impartial jury. The Supreme Court disagreed. Davis's failure to object at trial constituted a waiver of appellate review of the issue. Further, Davis did not meet the narrow criteria in St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), to warrant plain error review. Judgment was affirmed. St. v. Davis, 2003 MT

341, 318 M 459, 81 P3d 484 (2003), followed in St. v. Taylor, 2009 MT 161, 350 M 447, 208 P3d 422 (2009).

Failure to Raise Issue of Court Bias at Trial — Consideration of Issue Precluded on Appeal — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: Following conviction for felony stalking, defendant contended on appeal that there was bias against him at trial because the victim worked for the County Attorney's office where the District Court was located, so both the office and the District Court Judge should have recused themselves. However, the plain error doctrine did not apply under the limited exceptions in St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), and because the issue was not raised at trial, the Supreme Court declined to address it for the first time on appeal. St. v. Adgerson, 2003 MT 284, 318 M 22, 78 P3d 850 (2003).

Admissibility of Jail Medication Sign-Out Sheet to Show Inmate Drug Availability — Jail Drug Sale Conviction Affirmed: Defendant was convicted of sale of dangerous drugs after a jail inmate testified that he observed defendant and another inmate taking drugs that could have come only from defendant's prescription in the jail medication box. Defendant contended that admission of the jail medication sign-out sheet was improper because the prosecution failed to qualify the officer as custodian of or knowledgeable of the record. The Supreme Court noted that after the District Court overruled defense counsel's nonspecific objection to the officer's direct testimony, counsel then failed to assert any new objection on the basis of inadequate foundation, hearsay, or other grounds. By remaining silent, defendant waived any objection to admission of the medication sign-out sheet and failed to preserve the issue for appeal. The medication sign-out sheet was properly admitted absent a timely objection. St. v. Vandersloot, 2003 MT 179, 316 M 405, 73 P3d 174 (2003).

Failure to Object at Trial Constituting Waiver of Right to Claim Prosecutorial Misconduct on Appeal: Azure argued on appeal that the state committed prosecutorial misconduct by introducing allegedly false evidence during Azure's homicide trial regarding threats that Azure allegedly made toward the victim's brother on the night of the shooting. However, Azure made no contemporaneous objection to the testimony during trial, which constituted a waiver of Azure's right to appellate review of the claim. St. v. Azure, 2002 MT 22, 308 M 201, 41 P3d 899 (2002). See also St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271 (1992), and St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290 (1994).

No Review on Direct Appeal of Allegation of Improper Jury Impanelment Absent Objection at Trial: Azure appealed a conviction for deliberate homicide on grounds that the jury was unlawfully impaneled, citing St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000). Azure noted that he was tried 2 months after Lamere, in the same judicial district, and that it was probable that the same improper jury impanelment used in Lamere was used in Azure's case, making Azure's trial illegal as well. Azure asked the Supreme Court to remand for factfinding on the issue, because no record was made as to how the jury was impaneled. The Supreme Court declined to remand. Remanding for a hearing is not a proper remedy for an appeal on direct review, because an evidentiary hearing can be accomplished only in a postconviction hearing. It could not be determined from the record what procedure was used to summon the jury, so the issue could not be reviewed. Further, review pursuant to the plain error doctrine was not available, because there was no record for the Supreme Court to review to determine whether an error occurred, let alone if the error met the criteria of plain error under the common law or 46-20-701. St. v. Azure, 2002 MT 22, 308 M 201, 41 P3d 899 (2002).

Plenary Review of Criminal Sentence by Supreme Court Even Though No Objection Made at Sentencing: Brister was sentenced to 20 years for felony sexual assault with 10 years suspended, served the 10-year prison sentence, and then was released and began the 10-year suspended sentence. About 6 years into the suspended sentence, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court then revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Brister did not object to any of the conditions when they were imposed, but filed a motion objecting to the sentence 2 months later, claiming that the conditions were not and could not have been included in the original suspended sentence, and thus violated double jeopardy and ex post facto laws. The state maintained that Brister waived any objections to the conditions by failing to contemporaneously object when the sentence was pronounced, and that the appeal from the sentence was not timely filed. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. Further, Brister provided the District Court with an opportunity to correct any sentencing errors by filing an objection under 46-18-117 (now repealed), which allowed 120 days for correction of an illegal sentence, so Brister retained the right to appeal the purportedly illegal sentence. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), overruling St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019 (2000), St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), and St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), to the extent that those cases held that failure to raise a contemporaneous objection to an illegal sentence at the time of hearing resulted in waiver of defendant's objection, and followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). See also St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Failure to Object at Trial to Refusal to Allow Testimony of Additional Witnesses After Trial Commenced — No Interference With Constitutional Right to Present Defense: LaDue contended that failure to allow the testimony of two additional witnesses after the start of his trial on charges of attempted deliberate homicide interfered with his constitutional right to present a defense. However, LaDue did not raise the constitutional question at trial, thus failing to preserve the issue for appeal. Failure to raise the issue at trial constituted waiver of the right to appeal it. St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

Propriety of Prosecutor Vouching for Credibility of Witness Not Open for Appellate Review: Grace argued that the prosecutor had improperly vouched for the credibility of one of the state's witnesses during closing arguments and that he should have been granted a new trial by the lower court. The Supreme Court held that Grace had not objected to the prosecutor's statements during the trial and therefore the issue could not be raised for the first time on appeal. St. v. Grace, 2001 MT 22, 304 M 144, 18 P3d 1008 (2001).

Failure of Defense Counsel to Object to Comments by Judge — Potential Reaction by Jury Held Not to Relieve Necessity for Objection — Plain Error Doctrine Not Applied: During Scarborough's trial for deliberate homicide, the District Court Judge made two statements that Scarborough later interpreted as improper comments on the evidence. However, Scarborough did not object to either comment during the trial. Later, on appeal, Scarborough argued that he decided not to object to the District Court's comments during the trial because he was afraid of alienating the jury. The Supreme Court held that the risk of alienating the jury does not excuse the defense from objecting to what the defense believes is improper comments from the District Court Judge. The Supreme Court held that because the comments were not objected to during the trial, the objection was waived. The Supreme Court also refused to apply the common-law plain error doctrine because, taking the totality of the circumstances into consideration, the Supreme Court did not believe that the conditions requiring the application of that doctrine were presented in the case. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Offer of Proof Necessary to Enable Supreme Court Review of Ruling on Admissibility of Evidence: At Raugust's trial, he attempted to question witnesses regarding his prearrest statements, but the prosecution objected on grounds of hearsay and the trial court sustained the objections. On appeal, Raugust argued that the statements were offered to prove his state of mind rather than for the truth of the matter asserted and that he was thus denied the opportunity to present a defense because of the exclusion of evidence reflecting a reasonable doubt as to his guilt. However, when an objection to evidence is sustained and the answer of a witness is not apparent, an offer of proof is necessary to enable the Supreme Court to review the ruling. Raugust made no offer of proof or argument at trial with respect to why he felt the objection should be overruled and therefore waived his argument on appeal by failing to make an offer of proof once the objections were sustained. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St. Rep. 570 (2000). See also St. v. Jennings, 96 M 80, 28 P2d 448 (1934).

Failure to Object to Conduct of Psychological Evaluation or to Continuation of Sentencing Hearing — Waiver of Right to Consideration on Appeal: Osterloth was convicted of felony sexual assault and was required to undergo a sexual offender evaluation by a therapist of his choice at county expense. His scheduled sentencing was continued to allow the evaluation. On appeal, Osterloth contended that the District Court erred by sentencing him without an evaluation prepared by a qualified therapist, pursuant to 46-18-111, and by continuing sentencing instead of conducting a sentencing hearing without delay, as required in 46-18-115. The Supreme Court noted that under this section, it is precluded from considering an alleged error unless a timely objection was made or the criteria of 46-20-701 are met. Osterloth did not object to the evaluation being conducted by his own evaluator or to the sentencing continuation, nor did he assert that he could satisfy any of the requirements of 46-20-701. Thus, Osterloth waived the right to have the Supreme Court consider these alleged errors on appeal. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

District Court Exceeding Scope of Appellate Review — Abuse of Discretion in Applying Particularized Suspicion of DUI to Traffic Stop Triggered by Report of Vandalism: Robertson was stopped after a vehicle of the description that he was driving was reported leaving the scene of a vandalism. He was subsequently convicted of DUI in City Court and appealed to District Court on grounds that his right to confront witnesses was denied and that the city had not sustained the necessary burden of proof to support the conviction. The District Court remanded to the City Court for dismissal on grounds that the arresting officer did not have a sufficient particularized suspicion to justify the investigative stop for DUI. However, the issue of a sufficient particularized suspicion was never raised or ruled on in City Court by either Robertson or the city. When a District Court exercises its power of appellate review, it must refrain from deciding issues not properly raised or objected to in the court below; thus, the District Court abused its discretion by exceeding the scope of its appellate review in addressing the issue of particularized suspicion, so the Supreme Court reversed the order of the District Court dismissing the City Court judgment against Robertson. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000). See also Missoula v. Asbury, 265 M 14, 873 P2d 936, 51 St. Rep. 383 (1994), and St. v. Herrera, 1998 MT 173, 289 M 499, 962 P2d 1180 (1998).

Failure to Object to Closing Comments — Waiver of Right to Consideration on Appeal: Schmalz claimed that in closing arguments, the prosecutor argued a theory to the jury that was not supported by testimony, constituting prosecutorial misconduct, but Schmalz did not object to the comments during closing arguments. Failure to object resulted in failure to properly preserve the claim for appeal and resulted in the waiver of Schmalz's right to have the Supreme Court consider the claims regarding the prosecutor's closing argument. St. v. Schmalz, 1998 MT 210, 290 M 420, 964 P2d 763, 55 St. Rep. 889 (1998).

Evidence of Habit Disallowed — No Denial of Due Process and Right to Defense — Unspecific Objection — No Impairment of Substantial Rights by Comment of District Court on Merits of Defense: Huerta was tried on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of a juvenile and attempted to present evidence that it was the habit of the juvenile's mother to punish him severely. The District Court prevented the evidence from going to the jury. Huerta claimed that the District Court had prevented Huerta from presenting his only defense and thereby prevented him from obtaining a fair trial, in violation of his right to due process under the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and his right to a defense under the sixth amendment. The Supreme Court noted that the claim of denial of a constitutional right was made for the first time on appeal and, citing St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477 (1995), and St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592 (1996), held that Huerta had not made a specific enough objection when he objected at trial to a "miscarriage of justice". The Supreme Court also held that the District Court erred when it commented before the jury that "Brenda . . . is not on trial here". However, the Supreme Court held, as it noted that it had in St. v. Cassill, 71 M 274, 229 P 716 (1924), that under the circumstances, Huerta had received a fair trial and that his substantial rights were not prejudiced by the remark of the District Court. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 283, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Defendant Must Argue Insufficiency of Evidence Prior to Appeal: Walsh argued that the evidence presented in his trial was insufficient to support his conviction on the charges of aggravated assault. The Supreme Court held that it would not consider Walsh's argument because he had failed to raise the issue of insufficient evidence at any time prior to filing his brief on appeal. St. v. Walsh, 281 M 70, 931 P2d 42, 54 St. Rep. 64 (1997), overruled in St. v. Granby, 283 M 193, 939 P2d 1006, 54 St. Rep. 558 (1997). Granby was followed in St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994, 54 St. Rep. 542 (1997). Hagen was followed in St. v. Johnson, 2010 MT 288, 359 Mont. 15, 245 P.3d 1113.

In Camera Inspection of Note From Jury — Failure to Object as Precluding Appeal: Swan contended that he was deprived of his right to be present at all stages of trial because he was not present at an in camera hearing at which the trial court considered and answered a note from the jury inquiring whether an assault instruction applied to a felony aggravated assault charge as well as a felony assault (now assault with a weapon) charge. Both counsel were present for the discussion of the note, and neither objected to the court's answer. Swan's failure to object at the time that the note was discussed and to raise the objection in his motion for a new trial constituted the waiver of the objection when raised for the first time on appeal. St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933, 53 St. Rep. 1246 (1996).

Failure to Object and Failure to Invoke Exception — Waiver of Objection: Martin was charged with several counts of sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, and deviate sexual conduct. Martin sought to have the counts severed in such a manner that five separate trials would have been required, but the District Court refused to sever. Martin argued before the Supreme Court that he was prejudiced by action of the prosecutor. The Supreme Court held that because Martin had made no objection at trial to any of the alleged instances of misconduct and because he did not argue that he was entitled to raise the arguments pursuant to 46-20-701(2), the Supreme Court would not address the arguments of misconduct. St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996).

Claim First Made on Appeal That Judge Should Not Have Questioned Witness or Curtailed Line of Prosecution Questioning: In a prosecution for aggravated kidnapping and assault, the judge's questions to a witness who sold defendant bullets and curtailing of a line of questioning pursued by the prosecution would not be considered on appeal because they were not raised below. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Sexual Abuse — Failure of District Court to Consider Sentencing Alternatives — No Objection — Sentence Not Illegal or Violation of Due Process: Swoboda pleaded guilty to sexual abuse of children, was classified as a nondangerous offender, and was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections. On appeal, she claimed as error the District Court's failure to consider alternatives to incarceration. The Supreme Court noted that she had not objected at sentencing to the District Court's failure and declined to review the judgment. The Supreme Court noted that in the past, it had made an exception and reviewed such a failure of the District Court when the state conceded the failure of the District Court or when the sentence was illegal. Here, however, the Supreme Court noted that the sentence was not beyond the District Court's jurisdiction. Citing St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), the Supreme Court also held that the failure of the District Court was not a manifest miscarriage of justice and would not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial or the proceedings. St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996).

Failure to Object Bars Issues on Appeal — Designation as Dangerous Offender — Order for Alcohol Treatment — Failure to Advise Maximum Penalty: Hofman pleaded guilty to a felony and, at the conclusion of the sentencing hearing, was designated a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) and was ordered to undergo alcohol treatment. Hofman appealed the designation and the order and, in addition, alleged that the District Court failed to advise him of the maximum penalties for his offense. The Supreme Court held that Hofman's failure to raise these issues in the District Court precluded the issues from being raised on appeal. St. v. Hofman, 275 M 455, 913 P2d 1256, 53 St. Rep. 223 (1996).

DNA Evidence — General Objection in Motion In Limine Insufficient to Preserve Objection for Purposes of Appeal: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based in part upon DNA evidence that was combined with standard serological evidence to provide a combined statistical estimate of the probability that Weeks was the father of a child of his stepdaughter. Weeks objected to the combined evidence but not on a foundation basis. The state argued that Weeks waived any objection that he had to the combined evidence, but Weeks contended that his motion in limine preserved an objection to the evidence. The Supreme Court held that Weeks's motion in limine, which did not specify any reasons or authorities why the evidence should be excluded, did not contain an objection to the combined statistical evidence but simply concluded that the DNA evidence was prejudicial. The Supreme Court held that this objection was insufficient to preserve the issue for appeal. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995), followed in St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996).

Trial Court's Improper Questioning of Witness in Front of Jury Not Reversible Error: Kelly, convicted of kidnapping and unlawful sexual intercourse, argued that the trial court erred in questioning the minor victim as to competency in front of the jury. The Supreme Court held that no objection had been made during the trial and that the objection was therefore waived. The Supreme Court also held that although the trial court erred in questioning the child in front of the jury because a witness is presumed competent, there was other direct and corroborative evidence of Kelly's guilt. St. v. Kelly, 265 M 298, 876 P2d 641, 51 St. Rep. 522 (1994).

Claim of Error Not Within Exception — Waiver of Appellate Review: Defendant contended that the prosecutor's false comments precluded a fair trial. Unless claims of error fit within an exception to 46-20-701(2), appeal is improper. Appellate review was waived in this case because: (1) the right to object existed at the time of trial; (2) evidence was not suppressed; and (3) material and controlling facts upon which the claim was predicated were known to defendant and his attorney. St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994), followed in St. v. Riley, 270 M 436, 893 P2d 310, 52 St. Rep. 258 (1995), and St. v. Nelson, 274 M 11, 906 P2d 663, 52 St.

Rep. 1069 (1995). St. v. Nelson was followed in St. v. Hofman, 275 M 455, 913 P2d 1256, 53 St. Rep. 223 (1996).

Failure to Object to Closing Argument Regarding Defendant's State of Mind — Waiver of Right to Appeal: Although the prosecution inappropriately used evidence in closing arguments to suggest defendant's state of mind, failure of defendant to contemporaneously object to the alleged error at trial precluded the Supreme Court from reviewing the issue on appeal. The trial court must first be allowed the opportunity, through objection by the parties, to correct the error at trial. St. v. Losson, 262 M 342, 865 P2d 255, 50 St. Rep. 1588 (1993), followed in St. v. Wild, 266 M 331, 880 P2d 840, 51 St. Rep. 872 (1994), and St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996).

Failure to Offer Voluntariness Instruction or Object to Lack of Voluntariness Instruction: Defendant who did not offer an instruction on voluntariness as an element of every crime or object to failure to give such an instruction was not entitled to review of the issue on appeal. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992), followed, with regard to failure to offer instruction on a lesser included offense, in St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933, 53 St. Rep. 1246 (1996).

Refusal to Consider, in Absence of Objection, Discussion of Other Bad Acts Before Jury: The Supreme Court would not consider the issue on appeal in absence of objection at trial to discussion before the jury regarding whether evidence of other bad acts, which the court barred, should be admitted. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Failure to Raise Double Jeopardy Argument at Trial — Insufficient Record: The Supreme Court refused to consider a double jeopardy argument that was not raised in a timely fashion at trial, given that the record presented for review was insufficient to establish a double jeopardy defense. St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992).

Failure to Object to Admissibility of Testimony — Issue Not Considered on Appeal: The Supreme Court declined to consider on appeal the issues of evidence and confrontation raised on testimony when no objection was raised to the testimony at trial. St. v. McCord, 251 M 317, 825 P2d 194, 49 St. Rep. 53 (1992), followed in St. v. Stuit, 277 M 227, 921 P2d 866, 53 St. Rep. 607 (1996).

Failure to Object to Tape Recorder in Jury Room — Appeal Right Waived: After the case was submitted to the jury, the jury requested a tape recorder to play the recording of a drug transaction. Defendant was consulted and had no objection. Failure to object to the action at trial precluded defendant's right to raise the issue on appeal. St. v. Moreno, 248 M 91, 809 P2d 574, 48 St. Rep. 339 (1991).

Not Taking Stand Due to Judge's Comments: The defendant appealed his conviction on the basis that he had not taken the stand because he had relied on certain comments of the trial court with respect to corroborative testimony. The Supreme Court held that the issue was not before it because the defendant had failed to object at the close of his trial. St. v. Kaczmarek, 243 M 456, 795 P2d 439, 47 St. Rep. 1319 (1990), followed in St. v. Johnson, 257 M 157, 848 P2d 496, 50 St. Rep. 209 (1993).

No Prejudice Through Order in Companion Case: In a companion case involving defendant's brother, the trial court, over the brother's objection, ordered the production of statements made by individuals whom the brother intended to call as witnesses, pursuant to 46-15-323. Pursuant to an order in his own case, defendant was required to produce the same information. Defendant did not object to the order in his own case and was precluded from raising the issue on appeal. Further, defendant lacked standing to assert the privilege that was alleged by his brother; the defendant did not demonstrate any prejudice to him as a result of the order in the companion case. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Raising Issue in Postconviction Relief That Could Have Been Preserved for Appeal — Abuse of Process: Defendant sought to challenge jury instructions in a petition for postconviction relief after failing to object to the disputed instructions at trial. He offered no excuse for failing to object and did not argue that he could not have reasonably complied with the procedural requirements of 46-16-401 and this section. Because objections to the instructions could have been raised at trial, those grounds for relief could have reasonably been available for direct appeal. To allow defendant to raise an issue in postconviction relief that he could reasonably have preserved for direct appeal would constitute an abuse of process. St. v. Gorder, 243 M 333, 792 P2d 370, 47 St. Rep. 958 (1990), followed in St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54, 52 St. Rep. 735 (1995). Baker was followed in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Closing Argument — Prosecutor's Comments on Defendant Not Taking Stand: On appeal, defense counsel argued that the prosecutor's closing comments were directed at the defendant's failure to testify. The Supreme Court stated that it was incumbent on counsel to make his objection at the time of trial and that, as a general rule, the court does not entertain issues on appeal that were not raised at trial. St. v. Wiman, 236 M 180, 769 P2d 1200, 46 St. Rep. 279 (1989).

Untimeliness of Motion Waived by Failure to Object: A motion to suppress was filed the first day of trial, contrary to the 10-day notice requirement in 46-13-301. By failing to object to the timeliness of the motion at trial, any objection on appeal was waived under this section. (See 1991 amendment.) In re J.W.K., 223 M 1, 724 P2d 164, 43 St. Rep. 1483 (1986).

Constitutionality Not Considered: Defendant alleged for the first time on appeal that 45-5-201 is unconstitutional because it fails to provide a parent, who may use reasonable and necessary force to restrain or correct his child under 45-3-107, with any guidance in determining what is or is not reasonable or necessary force. The Supreme Court refused to consider the allegation on appeal, since none of the exceptions of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) were found to apply. St. v. Probert, 221 M 476, 719 P2d 783, 43 St. Rep. 988 (1986).

Alleged Constitutional Violation: Concerning an alleged constitutional violation (failure to allow defendant to confront witnesses by allowing hearsay evidence) when the error was not objected to at trial, a party must show prejudicial error and must satisfy one of the three requirements listed in 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) before the claim will be noticed on appeal. St. v. Cain, 220 M 509, 717 P2d 15, 43 St. Rep. 568 (1986), followed in St. v. Enright, 2000 MT 372, 303 M 457, 16 P3d 366, 57 St. Rep. 1590 (2000). See also Forsyth v. Allison, 274 M 246, 908 P2d 205, 52 St. Rep. 1212 (1995).

Failure to Object to In-Court Identification of Defendant — Issue Waived on Appeal: Where, in a prosecution for deliberate homicide in which a prosecution witness identified the defendant in court and the defendant failed to object to the identification, the failure of the defendant to object at trial precludes him on appeal from predicated error on the admission of the identification. [But see 1983 amendment allowing consideration on appeal under circumstances set out in 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987).] St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

Failure to Object to Jury Instructions — Issue Precluded on Appeal: Where the defendant was convicted of felony murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery and either failed to object at trial to certain instructions to the jury or concurred in those instructions, the Supreme Court found the defendant was precluded from raising alleged errors in those instructions for the first time on appeal. [But see 1983 amendment allowing consideration on appeal under circumstances set out in 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987).] The Supreme Court also found that the objections had no merit as the instructions objected to, or instructions substantially similar to them, had been approved in St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979). St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981). See also St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991).

Independent Knowledge of Juror — Failure to Object: The fact that a juror had acted as a special prosecutor in a disbarment action against an attorney under a workers' compensation indictment and had used the defendant's disbarment, which dealt at length with the facts involved in the defendant's criminal case, as a model in drafting his pleadings did not require a reversal of the defendant's conviction when, at the conclusion of the trial, the juror met with the judge and counsel and told them what he knew and the defendant made no objection. The defense failed to meet its responsibility by its failure to properly object and thereby give the court an opportunity to remedy any alleged defects. [But see 1983 amendment allowing consideration on appeal under circumstances set out in 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987).] St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

WAIVER OF ISSUE BY PARTY'S ACTION

Failure to Object to Jury Instruction — Waiver Due to Untimeliness: A defendant made a posttrial jury instruction and argued that it was reviewable on appeal pursuant to 46-20-104 and 46-20-701 because it was made "during trial" under St. v. Reichmand, 2010 MT 228, 358 Mont. 68, 243 P.3d 423, in which the Supreme Court announced that "during trial" encompassed the entire proceeding in the lower court. The Supreme Court noted that in addition to being made "during trial", an objection must also be timely. In this case, the grounds for objection were apparent before the jury was instructed, so the objection was untimely when the defendant failed to object contemporaneously and instead raised it following the verdict. St. v. Hamilton, 2018 MT 253, 393 Mont. 102, 428 P.3d 849.

Objectionable Testimony Elicited by Defendant's Own Actions — Right to Allege Error on Appeal Waived: Smith was charged with stealing his mother's credit card and using the card to withdraw money from her bank account and charge items for his personal use. Pretrial, Smith moved in limine to preclude witnesses at trial from testifying regarding Smith's prior criminal convictions, and the motion was granted. When his mother testified, Smith's counsel asked what efforts she made to locate Smith after discovering that her credit card was gone, and the mother responded that she had checked with Smith's parole officer to see if the officer knew where Smith was. Smith immediately moved for a mistrial, asserting that the comment violated the motion in limine, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the objectionable testimony was elicited by Smith's own actions, he waived the right to allege error on appeal because he actively participated in creating the error. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 18, 325 M 374, 106 P3d 553 (2005), following St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Failure to Object to Jury Instruction — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim Unfounded — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: The trial court instructed the jury that Gray could be convicted of assault on a peace officer if the state proved that Gray caused a reasonable apprehension of bodily harm in any of three police officers. Gray contended that the instruction erroneously allowed the jury to convict for assault on one or more of the officers without agreeing to one specific set of facts, in violation of the unanimity requirement that the jury must be in agreement as to the principal factual elements underlying the offense. Even though Gray's counsel acquiesced to the instruction, Gray contended that the fundamental right to a unanimous jury verdict is inviolate, so plain error review was appropriate. However, Gray not only failed to contemporaneously object to the instruction, but specifically asked the trial court to add the language that he argued on appeal was insufficient. The Supreme Court declined to apply the doctrine, refusing to put the trial court in error for an action in which Gray acquiesced and actively participated. Additionally, Gray's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on his attorney's acquiescence and participation in the jury instruction for strategic purposes also failed. In light of the overwhelming evidence of guilt, Gray could not show that the trial outcome was prejudiced because of the lack of a specific unanimity instruction or that the result would have been different if the attorney had not engaged in the legal strategy. The conviction was affirmed. St. v. Gray, 2004 MT 347, 324 M 334, 102 P3d 1255 (2004), followed in St. v. Gallagher, 2005 MT 336, 330 M 65, 125 P3d 1141 (2005).

No Appellate Review of Trial Court's Refusal to Allow Expert Testimony Absent Contemporaneous Objection: During Olsen's arson trial, Olsen sought to introduce testimony from a chemical engineer who had concluded that a faulty junction box was the cause of the fire. After voir dire to determine the engineer's qualifications to testify, the District Court granted the state's motion to exclude the engineer's testimony on grounds that he lacked the necessary expertise to testify on the subject of forensic electrical engineering. Olsen made no offer of proof regarding the witness's qualifications to testify or the substance of the testimony, nor did Olsen object to the refusal to allow the testimony. Nevertheless, on appeal, Olsen contended that the trial court erred in disallowing the testimony. The Supreme Court held that Olsen's failure to make a contemporaneous objection at trial constituted waiver of the objection, so the issue was not subject to appellate review. St. v. Olsen, 2004 MT 158, 322 M 1, 92 P3d 1204 (2004).

Record Devoid of Reasons for Counsel's Conduct During Voir Dire — Ineffective Assistance Claim Improperly Raised on Direct Appeal: Defendant's claims of ineffective assistance of counsel during voir dire could not be addressed without considering matters outside the record and were therefore inappropriate for direct appeal. The claims were thus dismissed without prejudice to defendant's pursuit of the claims in postconviction proceedings. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), following St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003).

Counsel Decision to Forego Certain Defense Considered Trial Strategy — Insufficient Record to Determine Effective Assistance of Counsel on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Hendricks contended that he was provided ineffective assistance of counsel in his assault trial because his attorney failed to raise the affirmative defense of justifiable use of force. However, in a disclosure statement filed prior to the omnibus hearing, Hendricks's counsel specifically noted that the defense of justifiable use of force would not be asserted. On the morning of trial, counsel stated that no jury instructions on the defense of justifiable use of force would be offered. Thus, the decision not to raise the defense was made consciously and was not the result of ignorance or neglect and was presumed to be sound trial strategy falling within the realm of reasonable professional conduct absent evidence to the contrary. Absent a sufficient record to address the issue of ineffective assistance, the direct appeal was dismissed, requiring Hendricks to raise the issue by a postconviction relief proceeding, if at all. The Supreme Court clarified that it will not longer use the approach in St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), to determine effective assistance of counsel, but rather the procedure set out in St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003). St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 223, 317 M 177, 75 P3d 1268 (2003), followed in St. v. Webster, 2005 MT 38, 326 M 112, 107 P3d 500 (2005), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

No Pretrial Determination Regarding Whether Statement Admissible for Impeachment Purposes — Waiver of Right to Object to Admissibility: At the time of arrest, Harris admitted an act of sexual intercourse with his adopted daughter. Prior to trial, Harris moved to suppress the statement on grounds that it was involuntary and obtained in violation of his fifth amendment rights under the United States Constitution. The District Court agreed that the statement could not be used, but expressly stated that its limited suppression order did not address whether it could be used by the state for impeachment purposes in the event that Harris testified, essentially reserving its ruling for a later time, as authorized in 46-13-104. Harris's testimony about the statement during direct examination brought the statement into evidence by his own volition, constituting waiver of the right to appeal the admissibility of the statement for use as impeachment. St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996), and St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Withdrawal of Proposed Instruction on Accountability — Waiver on Appeal: Sittner proposed a jury instruction stating that a defendant's knowledge that a crime is being committed, in conjunction with the defendant's presence during the crime, is insufficient to support a finding of guilt by accountability. The state's proposed instruction was that one may become an accomplice by being present and joining in the criminal act. Sittner withdrew his proposed instruction during settling of instructions, and the state's instruction was used. In the absence of a timely objection, Sittner's withdrawal of his proposed instruction constituted a waiver of the objection and precluded the raising of the issue on appeal, considering that none of the exceptions to the requirement for timely objection in 46-20-701 applied. St. v. Sittner, 1999 MT 103, 294 M 302, 980 P2d 1053, 56 St. Rep. 434 (1999).

REVIEW UNDER PLAIN ERROR DOCTRINE

Right to Testify at Trial — Assertion That Defendant Did Not Get to Decide Whether to Testify — No Plain Error: A defendant did not demonstrate that the District Court committed plain error by failing to make a record inquiry and determination as to whether he validly waived his right to testify at trial when he asserted during sentencing that he was talked out of testifying at the last minute and that he did not get to make a decision about testifying despite signing a written acknowledgment of his rights and multiple opportunities to discuss the matter with his counsel because the defendant was represented by counsel, had ample opportunity and did in fact consult with counsel before deciding to testify, was acutely aware of his right to testify, and at worst acquiesced to counsel's advice to not testify in order to avoid incriminating himself. St. v. Abel, 2021 MT 293, 406 Mont. 250, 498 P.3d 199.

Inapplicable Jury Instructions — Self-Defense Issue Clearly Argued to Jury — No Review Under Plain Error or Ineffective Assistance: The District Court's specific purpose jury instruction instead of a more appropriate self-defense instruction did not warrant review under either the doctrine of plain error or ineffective assistance of counsel. Given the trial record, the Supreme Court was not firmly convinced that failure to review the inapplicable instruction would have resulted in a manifest miscarriage of justice, left unsettled the question of fundamental fairness of the trial, or compromised the integrity of the judicial process. The Supreme Court also determined that the instruction did not derail what was a clearly directed trial about the defendant's intentions and his assertion that his actions of stabbing the victim with a knife multiple times were justified by self-defense. St. v. St. Marks, 2020 MT 170, 400 Mont. 334, 467 P.3d 550.

Prosecutor's Comments About Rising Insurance Rates During Closing Not Prejudicial in Context of Evidence Presented: During the state's closing argument at a trial for felony theft by insurance fraud, the prosecutor referred to rising insurance rates as a result of insurance fraud. The defendant did not object at the time, but on appeal he asked the Supreme Court to exercise plain error review of the remarks. The Supreme Court declined, holding that because of other evidence in the record regarding the fraud, the defendant could not demonstrate that the prosecutor's reference to rising rates was prejudicial in this context. St. v. Schaeffer, 2014 MT 47, 374 Mont. 93, 321 P.3d 809.

Failure to Object to Prosecutor's Closing Arguments — Waiver of Objection: Defendant contended that he was denied a fair trial because of comments made by the prosecutor during closing arguments regarding defendant's credibility. However, defendant failed to object and preserve the issue for appeal, so the objection was waived. Nevertheless, defendant urged the Supreme Court to employ discretionary plain error review and reverse, but the court was not persuaded that the comments resulted in a manifest miscarriage of justice, undermined the fundamental fairness of the trial, or compromised the integrity of the judicial process, so plain error review was denied. St. v. Rose, 2009 MT 4, 348 M 291, 202 P3d 749 (2009). See also St. v. Cooksey, 2012 MT 226, 366 Mont. 346, 286 P.3d 1174.

Trial Court's Comment on Defense Objection at Trial Not Compromising of Judicial Integrity — Plain Error Review Inappropriate: When the trial court sustained the state's objection to a prior hearsay statement of a witness, defense counsel objected and asked to put the objection on the record. The court replied, "Fine. So noted. You've asked the question, I've overruled it. You don't have to say anything more. The Supremes can read it." On appeal, defendant sought plain error review because the comment compromised the trial court's impartiality in front of the jury by assuming defendant's guilt and eventual conviction. The Supreme Court noted that trial courts should refrain from such comments in front of jurors but held that in this case, in context the comment was simply an explanation that no additional objection was necessary to preserve the objection for potential appellate review and did not compromise the integrity of the judicial process, so plain error review was not invoked. St. v. Skinner, 2007 MT 175, 338 M 197, 163 P3d 399 (2007).

No Clear Comment on or Infringement of Defendant's Right to Remain Silent — Plain Error Doctrine Not Invoked: Upshaw claimed that the testimony of a detective at trial regarding Upshaw's decision to exercise the right to remain silent violated the right to due process and the privilege against self-incrimination and that pursuant to Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976), the Supreme Court should invoke the plain error doctrine and reverse the conviction. The state asserted that the prosecutor did not commit a Doyle error by eliciting testimony of Upshaw's post-Miranda silence, but rather that the evidence came from a nonresponsive answer by the detective and that the prosecution did not deliberately seek to put the evidence before the jury or use the evidence to impeach Upshaw. The Supreme Court examined the record and determined that the brief comment on Upshaw's silence was confined to a minor portion of the detective's testimony and that the prosecutor did not pursue the issue, use the testimony to impeach Upshaw, or refer to the testimony in cross-examination or closing. To be plain, an error should firmly convince a person that the prosecutor's comments created an inference for the jury that, by remaining silent, Upshaw must be guilty. However, in this case, there was no such firm conviction. Thus, the court declined to invoke the plain error doctrine because there was no clear comment on or infringement of Upshaw's right to remain silent. St. v. Upshaw, 2006 MT 341, 335 M 162, 153 P3d 579 (2006), following St. v. Godfrey, 2004 MT 197, 322 M 254, 95 P3d 166 (2004).

Theory of Erroneous Jury Instruction Raised for First Time on Appeal — No Plain Error: At trial, the District Court instructed the jury to view with distrust the testimony of a witness who was legally accountable for the same crime as Daniels. Daniels objected to the instruction on grounds that the witness's testimony had changed and was no longer inculpatory, so the instruction was unnecessary. On appeal, Daniels argued that the instruction violated his right to a fair trial because it could have been construed to instruct the jury to distrust his exculpatory statements given to police immediately after his arrest, having implicated the witness in those statements. The Supreme Court found no prejudicial effect in the jury instruction, and Daniels could not argue on appeal a theory of error that was changed from the theory raised in trial court. St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), followed in St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003).

Prosecutorial Comments During Closing Not Violative of Defendant's Right to Fair Trial: Raugust argued on appeal that the prosecutor's comments during closing arguments deprived Raugust of a fair trial, notwithstanding the failure of Raugust's attorney to object, which Raugust characterized as ineffective assistance of counsel. Under this section, review is barred of any alleged errors not objected to at trial, unless the error falls within the exceptions in 46-20-701(2), but Raugust nevertheless urged review under the plain error doctrine. The Supreme Court held that this case did not present the requisite exceptional case to invoke the plain error doctrine because the alleged errors were either misstatements of fact, taken out of context of the prosecutor's argument, constituted the state's analysis of the evidence, or were later cured by the jury instructions. Raugust's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel also failed because Raugust did not meet the first prong of the Strickland test by showing that his counsel's performance was deficient. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St. Rep. 570 (2000). See also St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827 (1999), St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), and St. v. Wing, 2008 MT 218, 344 M 243, 188 P3d 999 (2008).

Claim First Made on Appeal That Judge Who Decided Issue of Flight in Bail Hearing Should Not Have Tried Case Because Flight Was an Issue: Defendant claimed that the lower court judge should not have tried his case because whether he had fled the jurisdiction was a seriously disputed question at trial. The judge had previously decided during a bail hearing that defendant was a flight risk. Defendant's contention that the judge was not truly impartial was precluded by statute from being decided on appeal because it was not raised below. The common-law plain error doctrine is an exception to the statute, but it is a doctrine that will be invoked only in exceptional cases in which failure to review the claimed error might result in manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of fundamental fairness at trial, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. It was determined inapplicable in this case. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Common-Law Plain Error — Case-by-Case Review: Despite the passage of 46-20-701, Montana's plain error statute restricting the review of errors not objected to at trial, the doctrine of common-law plain error review by the Montana Supreme Court continues to exist to allow correction of errors not objected to at trial but that affect the fairness, integrity, and public reputation of judicial proceedings. The Supreme Court retains the inherent power and obligation to interpret the constitution, protect individual rights, prevent manifest injustice, and correspondingly review lower court decisions and actions for error. The power of such review is inherent in the appellate process itself. Thus, while acknowledging the constraints of 46-20-701, the Supreme Court will discretionarily review claimed errors that implicate a criminal defendant's fundamental constitutional rights even if no contemporaneous objection is made and notwithstanding the statutory criteria, in the class of cases when failure to conduct the review may result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of trial proceedings, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. The doctrine will be applied sparingly and on a case-by-case basis. Nevertheless, the necessity for contemporaneous objection to claimed error remains because 46-20-701 will be applied, except in the class of cases mentioned above. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), followed in St. v. Monaco, 277 M 221, 921 P2d 863, 53 St. Rep. 604 (1996), *St. v. Prosecution Comment on Sexual Abuse in Opening Statement — Door Not Opened — Testimony Properly Excluded Under Rape Shield Law: Stuit was charged with sexual abuse of S.M., a minor. At trial, the District Court cautioned both the defense and prosecution that testimony concerning prior acts of abuse of S.M. would not be admitted. However, in an opening statement, the prosecution made reference to past sexual abuse of S.M. No objection was made by the defense at the time. Later, in a conference in chambers, the District Court noted that the statement came close to opening the door on the issue of past abuse, but ultimately ruled that the door had not been opened on the issue. The Supreme Court held that failure of defense counsel to make a contemporaneous objection waived the issue and that the doctrine of plain error did not apply under the statute. The Supreme Court also held that any evidence of prior abuse was inadmissible under the rape shield law. St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290, 51 St. Rep. 1238 (1994).

Alleged Court Error and Prosecutor Misconduct Not Objected to During Trial: Thompson argued that his conviction should be overturned because of errors by the District Court in instructing the jury and because of misconduct by the prosecutor during closing remarks. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had not objected during the trial and that the court would not implement the plain error doctrine because the defendant had made no showing that his rights had been substantially prejudiced. St. v. Thompson, 259 M 62, 853 P2d 1188, 50 St. Rep. 682 (1993). See also In re Petition of Slice, 271 M 337, 896 P2d 1125, 52 St. Rep. 472 (1995).

Failure to Object — No Plain Error in Admitting Mug Shot in Evidence: Absent proof that his substantial rights were prejudiced, appellant who did not object during the trial was not entitled to review of introduction into evidence of his mug shot, which he claimed indicated to the jury that he had a past criminal record. Even under the plain error doctrine, which provides a remedy to prevent manifest injustice when objection was not made below, reversal was not warranted. A mug shot is generally admissible, at the discretion of the judge, if disguised, as it was here, to remove law enforcement information. Appellant could not prove prejudice because eyewitnesses to the theft could not absolutely identify defendant from the mug shot, his own testimony showed that he in fact had a past criminal record, and his defense was that he was not the person who committed the theft. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Failure to Object to Judge Qualifying Ten-Year-Old Sexual Crime Victim as Witness in View of Jury — Not “Plain Error” — Mass of Damaging Evidence Precluding Any Prejudice: In the presence of the jury, the District Court Judge questioned the 10-year-old victim of a sexual crime and an aggravated assault about whether she was aware of the consequences of taking an oath and testifying. Defense counsel did not object. Although it would have been better to have conducted the questioning away from the jury and the questions should have been framed differently, any mistake did not warrant the application of the “plain error” rule of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) because the defendant was not prejudiced by the manner of qualifying the victim in light of all of the independent and highly damaging evidence against him. St. v. Smith, 208 M 66, 676 P2d 185, 41 St. Rep. 176 (1984).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — No Objection Raised to Improper Argument by Prosecution — Appealability: Although objection to the prosecutor’s argument may not be raised on appeal if it has not been raised at trial, if it forms a basis for an effective assistance of counsel issue, it will be considered on appeal. [Under the 1983 amendment of this section, it will be considered only under circumstances set out under 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987).] If a prejudicial prosecutorial argument is alleged, it will not be presumed. Rather, it must be established from the record that a substantial right has been denied. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

Violations Not Charged — Elimination From Probation Revocation Hearing Consideration: The District Court, sitting without a jury in probation revocation hearing, is presumed to be able to properly evaluate evidence and determine the credibility of witnesses without regard to incompetent evidence, and that ability was demonstrated where the judge eliminated from consideration all alleged probation violations not charged by petition and affidavit for revocation and therefore erroneously admitted at hearing. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981). See also St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299, 44 St. Rep. 181 (1987).

Review of Jury Instruction Later Declared Unconstitutional in Other Case — Plain Error Rule: The giving of a jury instruction, without objection by the defendant, that was subsequently declared unconstitutional in another case did not justify the use of the plain error rule when the instruction did not go to the essence of the case and was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Hardy, 185 M 130, 604 P2d 792 (1980).

INADEQUATELY SUPPORTED CLAIMS

Claim of Ineffective Assistance for Not Seeking Lesser Included Offense — Issues for Postconviction Relief Proceeding Based on Insufficient Record: After the defendant was convicted of attempted sexual intercourse without consent, he claimed that he received ineffective assistance of counsel given that his counsel did not seek a lesser included offense instruction. Citing St. v. Clary, 2012 MT 26, 364 Mont. 53, 270 P.3d 88, the Supreme Court determined that the record failed to provide a sufficient explanation for the actions of the defendant’s counsel, and therefore the issues were deemed to be better examined within a postconviction relief proceeding. St. v. Bishop, 2012 MT 259, 367 Mont. 10, 291 P.3d 538. See also St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 Mont. 58, 30 P.3d 340, and St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 Mont. 92, 167 P.3d 906.

Failure of Counsel to Move for Dismissal or Reduced Charges Based on Lack of Physical Evidence — Record-Based Claim Subject to Postconviction Review: Taylor contended on appeal that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for dismissal or reduction of a rape charge based on the absence of rape examination evidence. However, the record showed no explanation of the reasons for counsel’s omissions. Therefore, consideration of the issue was not appropriate for direct appeal, but rather was best suited for postconviction review. The Supreme Court declined to address why counsel chose to proceed as he did and dismissed Taylor’s appeal of this issue without prejudice. St. v. Taylor, 2010 MT 94, 356 Mont. 167, 231 P.3d 79.

No Record as to Why Counsel Took Particular Actions in Providing Defense — Effective Assistance Claim Not Appropriate for Direct Appeal: Hamilton claimed that he received ineffective assistance of counsel at a trial on incest charges, asserting that counsel: (1) failed to deliver on the promise that Hamilton would testify; (2) allowed a detective to testify regarding the veracity of Hamilton and the alleged victim; and (3) demeaned Hamilton and defense counsel in closing statements. The Supreme Court examined each claim but was unable to determine from the record why counsel took that particular strategy. Because the claims were not record-based, the effective assistance issue was not appropriate for direct appeal, and Hamilton's claim was dismissed without prejudice to raising the claim in postconviction relief proceedings. St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P3d 906 (2007), following St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001). See also St. v. Wright, 2011 MT 92, 360 Mont. 246, 253 P.3d 838, Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523, and St. v. Rodriguez, 2021 MT 65, 403 Mont. 360, 483 P.3d 1080.

Record-Based or Nonrecord-Based Information Determinative of Appropriateness of Direct Appeal or Petition for Postconviction Relief — Direct Appeal Dismissed When Record Insufficient to Substantiate Effectiveness of Counsel: In 1999, White moved for an evidentiary hearing to allow the development of facts that were not part of the record but that were necessary to sustain a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court declared by order that a petition for postconviction relief would be the proper avenue for White's nonrecord-based ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Nevertheless, in late 2000, White appealed, contending that the claim of prejudicial error resulting from her trial counsel's various failures to provide representation, such as the failure to call witnesses, make an opening statement, or offer a theory of the case at any stage of the proceedings, was supported by the record and proper for direct appeal. The general rule set out in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), is that when ineffective assistance claims are based on facts of record, they must be raised on direct appeal, while claims based on allegations not documented in the record must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. The underlying principle of the rule is that a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance. The two distinct classifications of on-record and off-record actions tend to overlap at times, and though not easily distilled into a formula, the definitive question that decides whether actions are on-record or off-record is whether the record fully explains why counsel took the particular course of action. Generally, an alleged failure to object to the introduction of evidence, to the testimony of a witness, or to prosecutorial misconduct at trial is considered record-based and appropriate for direct appeal. Likewise, counsel's own conduct in presenting the case, such as improperly eliciting damaging testimony from a witness or rendering an improper opening statement or closing argument, may be pointed to as record-based. Decisions regarding the timing and number of objections and whether to offer no opening statement at all lie within counsel's tactical discretion, indicating that nonrecord-based information explaining the tactic may be involved. Similarly, counsel's failure to adequately investigate, to prepare a defense, to become familiar with critical areas of the applicable law, to offer a particular jury instruction, to object to the trial court's failure to consider sentencing alternatives, to object to the admission of evidence that is evidenced by the record, or to fully inform defendant of the consequences of various options and rights, even though the prejudicial results of the ineffectiveness appear on the record, may constitute a nonrecord-based claim. In White's case, the record supplied some indicia of why a certain objection was raised at a particular time, but was still insufficient to determine to what extent counsel's actions were purely tactical or resulted from deficient representation. Thus, the information was considered nonrecord-based and should have been raised by petition for postconviction relief, so White's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice. St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), St. v. Notti, 2003 MT 296, 318 M 146, 79 P3d 289 (2003), St. v. Adgeron, 2003 MT 284, 318 M 22, 78 P3d 850 (2003), for a similar application of the Hagen rule and St. v. Davis, 2003 MT 341, 318 M 459, 81 P3d 484 (2003). See also St. v. St. Germain, 2007 MT 28, 336 M 17, 153 P3d 591 (2007), in which the Supreme Court declined to address a direct appeal of defense counsel's nonrecord-based reasons for making a double jeopardy argument and for failing to call a witness to testify in an incest case because the issues were appropriate for postconviction proceedings. See also St. v. Green, 2009 MT 114, 350 M 141, 205 P3d 798 (2009), in which an ineffective counsel appeal based on counsel's failure to request an accomplice instruction in a homicide trial was dismissed in favor of postconviction relief proceedings because plausible justifications existed for counsel's conduct that could not be addressed on appeal since the record did not resolve the factual questions surrounding counsel's actions.

Objection to Qualifications of Pathologist to Testify Regarding Gunshot Wound: At Clausell's deliberate homicide trial, objection was made to the testimony of a Board-certified clinical pathologist who offered opinions regarding a gunshot wound, on grounds that the pathologist was not a Board-certified forensic pathologist and therefore was not qualified to testify. However, the doctor had performed over 400 autopsies, including about 40 that involved gunshot wounds. Clausell did not offer any applicable legal theory that a clinical pathologist with such experience who is not a forensic pathologist is not qualified to testify in a homicide case, and the Supreme Court declined to adopt a rule to that effect. Further, Clausell failed to preserve any other objection at trial to the pathologist's testimony and was precluded from raising other issues regarding the testimony on appeal. St. v. Clausell, 2001 MT 62, 305 M 1, 22 P3d 111 (2001), distinguishing In re K.H. & K.L.E., 1999 MT 128, 294 M 466, 981 P2d 1190 (1999).

PARTICULAR MATTERS NOT CONSTITUTING ERROR

Element of Crime Revealed Through Stipulation Entered for Strategic Reasons — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: At Auld's trial for witness tampering, defense counsel entered a stipulation revealing that Auld's parole officer, who was designated as a government employee, had or was about to engage in an investigation to determine if Auld had violated a rule by consuming alcohol. Auld asserted that counsel provided ineffective assistance by entering the stipulation and conceding an element of the offense of witness tampering. The Supreme Court found Auld's argument unavailing. Counsel entered the stipulation for strategic reasons so that the jury would not hear that Auld was on parole at the time that the offense took place, and Auld could not use trial tactics and strategic decisions as a basis for an ineffective assistance of counsel claim. St. v. Auld, 2006 MT 189, 333 M 125, 142 P3d 753 (2006). See also St. v. Grixti, 2005 MT 296, 329 M 330, 124 P3d 177 (2005), and St. v. Worthan, 2006 MT 147, 332 M 401, 138 P3d 805 (2006).

Counsel's Failure to Interview and Call Witnesses Within Range of Reasonable and Sound Professional Decisions — Failure to Prove Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Weaver contended that his defense counsel was ineffective in failing to interview and call certain witnesses and in not introducing an entomologist's report that might have created a reasonable doubt as to Weaver's role in a homicide. Under the first prong of the Strickland test, Weaver needed to overcome the strong presumption that counsel's defense strategies and trial tactics fell within a wide range of reasonable and sound professional decisions. The Supreme Court examined each of Weaver's contentions and determined that: (1) counsel's decision not to investigate potential witnesses did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness; (2) Weaver failed to meet the burden of showing that counsel's failure to interview potential witnesses constituted ineffective assistance to the extent that it resulted in prejudice raising a reasonable probability that the trial outcome would have been different; (3) counsel's decision not to call every witness that Weaver identified actually carried fewer risks and promoted Weaver's best interest at trial; and (4) failure to introduce the entomologist's report was tactical and the result of a conscientious, weighed decision made after consultation with Weaver and thus was not erroneous. Weaver's ineffective assistance claim failed. Weaver v. St., 2005 MT 158, 327 M 441, 114 P3d 1039 (2005), following Clausell v. St., 2005 MT 33, 326 M 63, 106 P3d 1175 (2005).

Prosecutor's Comments Not Affecting Outcome of Trial — Failure to Prove Prosecutorial Misconduct: Clausell's defense in a deliberate homicide trial was that the victim's death was a "tragic accident". Because of Clausell's defense, his counsel failed to object to numerous comments by the prosecutor that focused on rebutting the "tragic accident" theory. On appeal, Clausell contended that the prosecutor's statements constituted prosecutorial misconduct and that his attorney's failure to object to the comments or to move to suppress evidence of the search of Clausell's apartment amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed on both issues. Given that the state presented sufficient evidence of deliberate homicide and that the jury was admonished to consider only the evidence, Clausell failed to show that the prosecutor's comments affected the trial's outcome. Because no prosecutorial misconduct occurred, defense counsel's failure to object to the comments could not be considered ineffective assistance, and defense counsel's trial tactics, including failure to seek to suppress evidence that was in plain view, fell within the wide range of reasonable and sound professional decisions. Clausell failed to establish that his attorney's lack of objections fell below the objective reasonableness standard or that he was prejudiced to the point that a reasonable probability existed that the result of the trial would have been different had counsel not performed ineffectively. The deliberate homicide conviction was affirmed. Clausell v. St., 2005 MT 33, 326 M 63, 106 P3d 1175 (2005), followed in St. v. Misner, 2007 MT 235, 339 M 176, 168 P3d 679 (2007). See also St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262 (1983).

Evidence of Other Crimes as Proof of Continuing Course of Conduct — Adequacy of Jury Instruction — Failure to Make Specific Objection: Defendant Howell contended that the District Court's instruction to the jury that it could consider evidence of other crimes as proof of a continuous pattern of conduct violated the Just notice and jury instructions. Although the phrase "continuing course of conduct" has never been specifically approved for use in a jury instruction, it has been used interchangeably with several of the Just requirements. Use of the phrase in this case was found to be surplusage that was improperly included in the instruction; however, its use was not prejudicial and constituted harmless error. Further, Howell's failure to object to the adequacy of the Just notice requirements waived any deficiency in the notice. St. v. Howell, 254 M 438, 839 P2d 7, 49 St. Rep. 759 (1992).

Sua Sponte Instruction on Lesser Included Offense Not Required by Law or Due Process: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in not giving an instruction of its own accord on the lesser offense of misdemeanor sexual assault following his trial for felony sexual intercourse without consent when a request for the instruction was never made by the defense. Although a defendant has a right to a lesser included offense jury instruction if requested, mandatory instruction on lesser offenses on the judge's own accord is inconsistent with Montana law and the public policy of allowing trial counsel to conduct the case according to strategy and could result in unfair surprise to both the defense and the prosecution. Moreover, a District Court's failure to instruct the jury sua sponte on a lesser included offense does not constitute deprivation of a defendant's right to due process. St. v. Sheppard, 253 M 118, 832 P2d 370, 49 St. Rep. 382 (1992), followed in St. v. Howell, 254 M 438, 839 P2d 87, 49 St. Rep. 759 (1992), and St. v. Leyba, 276 M 45, 915 P2d 794, 53 St. Rep. 7 (1996).

Screening of Child Witnesses at Trial — Conformity With Federal Constitution — Test — Failure to Raise State Constitutional Issue in Lower Court: Defendant argued that placement of a 6½-foot high by 10-foot wide opaque screen between himself and two child witnesses at his trial for sexual assault violated his constitutional rights to confront the witnesses against him. Defendant's failure to argue or object in the trial court on the basis of the Montana Constitution precluded consideration of the state issue on appeal. However, the Supreme Court cited Md. v. Craig, 497 US 836, 111 L Ed 2d 666, 110 S Ct 3157 (1990), and Coy v. Iowa, 487 US 1012, 101 L Ed 2d 857, 108 S Ct 2798 (1988), in finding that defendant's lack of opportunity for personal observation of the witnesses was not dispositive. Confrontation rights are not absolute but may give way to other competing interests so as to permit the use of certain procedural devices necessary to shield a child witness from the trauma of courtroom testimony. The test for determining necessity is: (1) the trial court must hear evidence and determine whether use of a procedure other than face-to-face confrontation is necessary to protect the welfare of the child witness; (2) the court must also find that the child would be traumatized, not by the courtroom generally but by the presence of the defendant; and (3) there must be a finding that the emotional distress suffered by the child in the presence of the defendant is more than mere nervousness, excitement, or some reluctance to testify. Federal standards having been met in this case, use of the opaque screen was not violative of the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Davis, 253 M 50, 830 P2d 1309, 49 St. Rep. 342 (1992).

Sufficient Evidence for Jury to Return Guilty Verdict: The defendant argued that there was insufficient evidence to support a guilty verdict for witness tampering. The Supreme Court held that the evidence that the defendant knew he was charged with two counts of domestic abuse (now partner or family member assault) and that he threatened his girlfriend that he or his friends would get her if she testified was sufficient to support the jury's findings. St. v. Matt, 245 M 208, 799 P2d 1085, 47 St. Rep. 1988 (1990). See also St. v. Hembd, 254 M 407, 838 P2d 412, 49 St. Rep. 788 (1992).

Comment on Defendant's Failure to Testify: The defendant appealed his conviction, alleging that the jury instruction provided by the prosecution commented on his refusal to testify and prejudiced his case. The Supreme Court held that even though the appeal was not timely, the court would hear it in order to preserve the substantial rights of the defendant. The court stated that the instruction would not have been prejudicial if requested by the defendant and that the third paragraph of the instruction relating to evaluating a testifying defendant's credibility should not have been given but was harmless error. St. v. Amsk, 243 M 39, 792 P2d 1109, 47 St. Rep. 1075 (1990).

Pro Se Case Appeal Filed Without Briefs — General Review of Transcript on Court's Motion: Where the defendant made the defense of his deliberate homicide case difficult by failing to cooperate with his several attorneys, and after conviction was granted several extensions by the Supreme Court for filing a transcript and his first brief, but nevertheless failed to file a brief and specifications of error, the Supreme Court on its own motion reviewed the District Court transcript for typical kinds of errors and found: (1) that the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction as the defendant was convicted on the basis of his own testimony; (2) that there were no errors in the jury instructions given on the evidence and the elements of the crime; (3) that assistance of counsel was adequate and that the failure of defendant's counsel to subpoena evidence or witnesses was not relevant to the crime charged; and (4) that the statutory penalties for deliberate homicide with a dangerous weapon did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Graham, 206 M 49, 669 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 1499 (1983).

Actions of Prosecutor Based on Provocation by Defense Counsel — No Error Found: Where, in a prosecution for deliberate homicide, the prosecuting attorney responded to certain evidentiary tactics of defense counsel by questioning him about his drinking habits, the court did not err in failing to caution the jury with respect to the alleged prejudicial comments of the prosecuting attorney. It has generally been held that an appellant may not predicate error upon the prosecuting attorney's actions where such were induced or provoked by the appellant's counsel. The defendant also failed to offer an appropriate cautionary instruction. Any irregularity did not affect the defendant's substantial rights. St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

RETROACTIVITY ISSUES

Life Sentence for Juvenile Offender Upheld — Miller v. Alabama Is Procedural Rule — Not Substantive — Not Watershed Procedural — Not Retroactive on Collateral Review: In 1984, petitioner was sentenced to the maximum sentence of 100 years' imprisonment for a deliberate homicide that was committed when he was age 17. Twenty-eight years later, the U.S. Supreme Court held in Miller v. Alabama, 567 US 460, 132 S Ct 2455 (2012), that: (1) mandated life incarceration without the possibility of parole for a juvenile offender is unconstitutional; and (2) a sentencer must follow a certain process before imposing a life without the possibility of parole sentence on a juvenile. In light of Miller, petitioner, in a habeas corpus proceeding, argued that his sentence is equal to life without parole and unconstitutional given that his sentencer did not consider how age counseled against his sentence. After concluding that the sentencing consideration rule is a new rule, subject to the general rule of nonretroactivity, the Supreme Court declined to apply an exception and label the rule as a substantive rule or a watershed procedural rule. Instead, the court determined that Miller is a procedural rule that is not retroactive on collateral review and it did not reach the merits in the case. Beach v. St., 2015 MT 118, 379 Mont. 74, 348 P.3d 629.

What Constitutes Similarly Situated Case for Purposes of Retroactive Application of New Rule — Issue Required to Be Raised in Trial Court: As a general principle, in order for a case to be similarly situated for purposes of retroactive application of a newly announced rule, the issue addressed by the new rule should be raised by the movant at the trial court level and properly preserved for appeal. The only exception would be a challenge under the common-law plain error doctrine or if unique circumstances apply, such as those in St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P3d 1001 (2005). Here, Foster-DeBerry contended that the new rule regarding suppression of telephone and transmission recordings announced in St. v. Goetz & St. v. Hamper, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), should retroactively apply to Foster-DeBerry's case, which was pending when the Goetz-Hamper rule was announced. However, Foster-DeBerry never filed a motion to suppress or raised the legal issues addressed in Goetz-Hamper in trial court, and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal, so Foster-DeBerry was not entitled to retroactive application of the Goetz-Hamper rule. Further, Foster-DeBerry did not argue for application of the plain error doctrine, so the Supreme Court declined to apply it. St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008 MT 397, 347 M 164, 197 P3d 1004 (2008), following Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 US 314 (1987), and St. v. Zivcic, 598 NW2d 565 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999), and overruled, to the extent that it requires objection to warrantless recordings to be made at trial, by St. v. Reichmand, 2010 MT 228, 358 Mont. 68, 243 P.3d 423.

Conviction of Felony Nonsupport Prior to Legislative Creation of Felony Offense Considered Improper Ex Post Facto Application Warranting Reversal — Common-Law Plain Error Doctrine Applied: Price was convicted of felony nonsupport for failure to make payments from 1988 through 1996 and was given the maximum 2-year sentence; however, the felony nonsupport statute was not enacted until 1993. On appeal, Price contended that the manner in which the felony nonsupport statute was applied violated the fundamental constitutional right to be free from ex post facto laws. The state argued that because Price failed to object at trial, the issue could not be raised on appeal. The issue of whether Price was convicted of felony nonsupport that occurred before the statute was enacted brought into question the fundamental fairness of Price's trial. The Supreme Court held that because a fundamental right was at issue, the common-law plain error doctrine applied despite Price's failure to preserve the issue at trial. A jury instruction allowed the jury to find Price guilty based on acts committed from 1988 through 1996 and thus subjected Price to increased punishment for conduct that occurred prior to enactment of the felony statute. This was an unconstitutional ex post facto application of the felony nonsupport law, constituting reversible error. St. v. Price, 2002 MT 284, 312 M 458, 59 P3d 1122 (2002).

Retroactive Applicability of Judicial Rule Regarding Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: Retroactivity is a threshold matter that compels the evenhanded application of a new rule for the conduct of criminal prosecutions to all similarly situated cases that are pending on direct appeal or not yet final. Therefore, all defendants whose cases meet those criteria are entitled to the retroactive application of a new judicial rule of criminal procedure. This standard applies irrespective of whether the new judicial rule constitutes a clear break from existing precedent and without regard to whether the rule was available to the District Court at the time that it ruled. Thus in the present case, the rule in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), that oral pronouncement of sentence controls over the written sentence for purposes of finality applied retroactively to Waters' appeal, even though the District Court did not have the Lane rule at the time of sentencing. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), following St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), overruling St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), Peterson v. Mont. Bank of Bozeman, N.A., 212 M 37, 687 P2d 673 (1984), and their progeny, and followed in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). See also Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989).

Exceptions to General Rule of Retroactivity — Guillaume Inapplicable to Case Finalized Before Adoption of New Constitutional Rule: Although Nichols' conviction, resulting in an enhanced penalty for use of a weapon, was finalized more than 5 years prior to the Supreme Court's decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), which created a new constitutional rule barring enhanced weapon sentences when the underlying offense requires proof of use of a weapon, Nichols nevertheless argued that the portion of his sentence precluded by Guillaume should be stricken from his sentence. The Supreme Court applied the retroactivity criteria in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), noting that two exceptions apply to the general rule of retroactivity. The first exception applies when the constitutional rule puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe; the second exception applies when the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute watershed rules of criminal procedure. Finding that Guillaume was not dictated by prior precedent and did not set out a watershed rule, the court held that the new rule did not require retroactive application to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when the Guillaume opinion was issued. Not only was Nichols' claim time-barred under the pre-1997 version of 46-21-102, his argument that the sentence should be reduced to prevent a miscarriage of justice also failed because miscarriage of justice refers to actual, not legal, innocence. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), followed in St. v. Baker, 1999 MT 251, 296 M 253, 989 P2d 335, 56 St. Rep. 987 (1999), and overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Substantial Change in Applicable Law — Teague Criteria: Byers filed for postconviction relief based on allegations that the Montana Supreme Court had reversed its position on the constitutionality of two sets of jury instructions regarding the mental element of the offense of deliberate homicide and voluntary intoxication subsequent to Byers' previous appeal. The U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), analyzing the retroactive application of judicial decisions to cases on collateral review, stated that a new rule will not be applied to cases coming before the court on collateral review after the date of the decision. A new rule was defined as a rule in which the result was not dictated by precedent at the time that the defendant's conviction became final. The Montana Supreme Court found that Byers' objection to jury instructions in his previous appeal had been overruled in St. v. Rothacher, 272 M 303, 901 P2d 82 (1995), amounting to a substantial change in applicable law that was not barred by Teague, but that the instructional error in Byers' trial was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The court declined to apply the new rule regarding instructions on voluntary intoxication set out in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), because that decision specifically precluded retroactive application and because it had been subsequently overruled by the U.S. Supreme Court, resulting in no substantial change in the applicable law. Byers v. Mahoney, 279 M 28, 929 P2d 202, 53 St. Rep. 624 (1996). The Teague criteria were applied in St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999). The Teague criteria were also applied in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999).

Part 2

Initiation of Appeal

Part Case Notes

Timely Appeal Necessary: The Supreme Court was without jurisdiction to hear an appeal when a criminal defendant filed a notice of appeal more than 60 days after the rendition of judgment. State ex rel. Graveley v. District Court, 178 M 1, 582 P2d 775 (1978).

Copy of Transcript — Indigent:

When an indigent prison inmate's 60 days for appeal had expired, he could not get a copy of the trial and court record transcript. Ketcham v. St., 167 M 535, 541 P2d 68 (1975).

When a person convicted in the District Court petitioned the Supreme Court for a Writ of Mandate to compel the District Court to furnish a "copy of trial and court record transcript" for the purpose of appeal in forma pauperis, the Writ was denied when no timely application had been filed. State ex rel. Treat v. District Court, 124 M 234, 221 P2d 436 (1950).

Dismissal of Appeal: The motion of the Attorney General to dismiss appeals was well taken when the appeals were not taken within the time allowed by statute, no notice of appeal was filed or served, no proper record on appeal was filed, and no papers on the appeals were served upon either the County Attorney or the Attorney General. St. v. Martin, 147 M 548, 416 P2d 22 (1966).

Denial of Motion for Mistrial: The part of the defendant's appeal claiming that the trial court erred in denying a motion of the defendant for a mistrial was properly before the Supreme Court when it was taken within the time allowed by statute. St. v. Tiedemann, 139 M 237, 362 P2d 529 (1961).

Denial of Motion for New Trial: The motion of the State to strike the defendant's third specification of error, contending that there was no substantial evidence to support the verdict or judgment of conviction, was granted when the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the order denying the motion for a new trial. St. v. Tiedemann, 139 M 237, 362 P2d 529 (1961).

Excuse for Failure to Take Timely Appeal: When the District Court appointed counsel for the defendant and ordered preparation of the record for an appeal to the Supreme Court, all at public expense, the defendant having had no voice in the choice, in the interest of justice it was incumbent upon the Supreme Court to consider the contended errors although the court-appointed counsel failed to timely file the notice of appeal. St. v. Frodsham, 139 M 222, 362 P2d 413 (1961).

Insufficient Excuse for Failure to Take Appeal: Under a former statute allowing 6 months to appeal from a judgment, the death of defense counsel nearly a year after the trial and order of commitment was not a sufficient showing to justify an original Writ of Habeas Corpus in the Supreme Court. Dryman v. St., 139 M 141, 361 P2d 959 (1961).

Oral Request for Appeal Ineffective: A request stating an intention to appeal made orally in open court is wholly ineffectual to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction. State ex rel. Treat v. District Court, 124 M 234, 221 P2d 436 (1950).

Subsection [(1)] is in harmony with our present code. However, in subsection[s (2), (3), and (4)] the necessity of obtaining a certificate of a judge stating that there is probable cause for appeal, as required by the present code, as a prerequisite for staying execution of judgment has been omitted. This appears to be an unnecessary and time consuming procedural step.

Subsection [(4)] permits review even though defendant is admitted to probation. If defendant is admitted to probation the order so admitting him shall remain in effect or he must post bail.

Case Notes

Convicted Felon Allowed Preconviction Bail Not Automatically Entitled to Bail Pending Appeal: Prior to his conviction for deliberate homicide, Moore was allowed bail, and following conviction, he was designated a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for purposes of parole eligibility. After conviction, Moore was denied bail pending appeal. Moore petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that he is entitled to bail pending appeal as a matter of law pursuant to 46-9-107 and this section. The Supreme Court found that under 46-9-107, the District Court was required to order the detention of Moore unless it found that he was “not likely to flee”. Since the District Court made the opposite finding based on evidence presented at the hearing, the Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in the District Court’s order denying bail pending appeal. The Supreme Court also held that the phrase “[i]f an appeal is taken and the defendant is admitted to bail” contained in subsection (2) of this section referred to bail pending appeal and requires that the District Court stay the execution of its sentence if the defendant is admitted to bail pending appeal. Because Moore was not admitted to bail pending appeal, his sentence should not be stayed. Moore v. McCormick, 260 M 305, 858 P2d 1254, 50 St. Rep. 1054 (1993).

Probation Violator Subject to Provisions Regarding Release on Bail: A person who has been convicted, sentenced, and placed on probation and who has violated probation is subject to the provisions regarding release on bail. The provisions of 46-20-204, providing for a stay of execution and relief pending appeal of original conviction, do not apply. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Case Notes

Right to a Speedy Trial: An appeal by the State of an order for a change in venue must be charged against the State in determining whether the defendant’s right to a speedy trial has been violated. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Part 7 Action by Court

Part Case Notes

Failure to Request More Specific Instructions at Trial Level: On appeal, the defendant argued that more specific instructions were necessary. The defendant, however, did not request more specific instructions at trial. The defendant cannot on appeal hold the state or the trial court responsible for her failure to request more specific instructions. St. v. Goltz, 197 M 361, 642 P2d 1079, 39 St. Rep. 613 (1982).

Adequacy of Jury Instructions — Definition of Statutory Term — Case-by-Case Determination: Defendant in a deliberate homicide case urged that a proposed jury instruction defining “forcible felony” was refused incorrectly. As in an earlier case, the Montana Supreme Court held that a definition of every term in an applicable statute need not be given but rather, by necessity, each case must be considered on its own facts as to the adequacy of instructions on every theory having support in the evidence presented. Here, the definition of “forcible felony” added nothing to the term being defined and the lack of the instruction could not prevent the defendant from fully presenting his case to the jury. Therefore, there was no error in refusing the proposed instruction. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Admission of Evidence of Prior Relationship Between the Defendant and the Victim’s Girlfriend and Threats by Defendant Against Her: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case claimed on appeal that the trial court erred in admitting into evidence acts and statements of the defendant which occurred prior to the shooting. The evidence concerned the former romantic relationship of the victim's girlfriend with the accused, the ill feelings of the defendant toward the victim that developed after the defendant's relationship with the woman was replaced with the victim's relationship with her, and the ensuing threats made by the defendant toward the woman. Because the State had to prove that the defendant purposely or knowingly caused the victim's death, the evidence of the defendant's intent was relevant in general and specifically because the defendant here alleged that he shot the victim in self-defense. Although threats against a person other than the victim are not admissible generally, when the circumstances are such that the threat tends to show hostility toward the deceased, they are relevant. Although evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith, it may be admissible for other purposes such as proof of motive or intent or where such evidence forms a part of a single chain of facts is so intimately connected that the whole must be considered in order to interpret its several parts. Further, the challenged testimony was crucial to prove defendant's mental state at the time of the shooting, and as a result, the probative value outweighed its prejudicial effect. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Change of Venue — Grounds for Denial — Trial Court's Discretion: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case had moved for a change of venue based on allegedly inflammatory pretrial publicity and general bias against him in the county where the victim was killed. The Supreme Court held that a motion for a change of venue is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and a denial is not reversible error in the absence of an abuse of discretion by the trial court. The Supreme Court also looked at the indicia of a denial of a fair trial resulting from prejudicial publicity (i.e., arousal of feelings of the community, threat to personal safety of the defendant, established opinion of members of the community as to the guilt of the accused, news articles beyond the objectivity of news printing and dissemination, and difficulty or failure in securing a fair and impartial jury from the community in which the news articles appeared). Having applied these indicators to the defendant's case and having considered the allegedly inflammatory news articles and broadcasts and the voir dire examination of prospective jurors, the Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in the denial of the motion for a change of venue. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Defendant's Challenge of Jurors — Discretion of Judge in Ruling on Challenges: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case appealed his conviction in part on the basis that the trial court erred in denying his challenge to the jury panel as a whole and to one juror in particular. While noting that the right to a trial by an impartial jury is an unqualified one, the Supreme Court said that the pertinent inquiry was whether or not the jury empaneled was able to render an impartial judgment based solely upon the evidence presented at trial. Considering that each juror gave an assurance of impartiality and that the trial judge made cautionary remarks to the jury that they had a duty to lay aside their opinions and impressions, the Supreme Court held that under the circumstances the trial judge did not abuse his discretion by denying the defendant's challenge to the jury panel. With respect to the individual juror, the court noted that the judge had questioned the juror and that she had made it clear that she could put her emotions aside and judge the defendant fairly and solely upon the evidence presented at trial. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Jury Instruction on "Aggressor" — Self-Defense: An instruction defining "aggressor" and stating the unavailability of the defense of self-defense to an aggressor was appealed because there allegedly was no evidence presented in support of the instruction and, as given, allegedly was an incorrect statement of the law. The Supreme Court said that the trial judge must instruct the jury on every essential question presented by the evidence. Testimony that the defendant and a friend had made efforts to attract the victim's attention as he came out of the bar just before the shooting, coupled with the testimony of the defendant's prior acts of hostility towards the victim and his girlfriend, was sufficient to justify the aggressor instruction. Defendant's allegation that the jury instruction incorrectly stated the law also was rejected on appeal. The exceptions to the lack of availability of the defense of self-defense to an aggressor were inapplicable to the facts. Furthermore, the State had offered an instruction incorporating statutory language of 45-3-105, but the defendant rejected that proposed jury instruction. The reviewing court held that having objected to the very instruction he now asserts should have been included, defendant may not then predicate error on the absence of the qualifying instruction. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Jury Instruction on "Occupied Structure" — Coverage of Vehicles: On appeal from a conviction for deliberate homicide, the defendant claimed his proposed jury instruction on "occupied structure" was correct because the statutory definition includes "vehicle". However, the Chevrolet Blazer in which the defendant was sitting when he shot the victim was not covered by the definition, since the structure must be suitable for human occupancy or night lodging of persons or for carrying on business and the Blazer was not so suitable. A defendant is entitled to an instruction having support in the evidence presented but not if there is no such support. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Jury Instructions on Lesser Included Offenses — No Error When Omitted Instruction Not Offered by Appellant: On appeal, the defendant in a deliberate homicide case alleged error in the failure to give jury instructions on mitigated deliberate homicide and negligent homicide. The general rule is that an instruction is required where there is some evidence to support the lesser included offense. Both negligent homicide and mitigated deliberate homicide are to be considered lesser included offenses of deliberate homicide. Here, a lesser included offense instruction was offered by the State and objected to by the defense. The Montana Supreme Court reiterated its position that error may not be predicated upon the failure to give an instruction when the party alleging the error failed to offer the instruction. Failure to offer an instruction removes the cause of error, particularly when the defense counsel has objected to the instruction upon the ground that the defendant was either guilty of deliberate homicide or not guilty. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Jury Instructions on "Serious Bodily Harm" and "Serious Bodily Injury" — Applicability — Requirements: Defendant in a deliberate homicide case contended on appeal that the trial court failed to instruct the jury fully and fairly on the law of self-defense. The disagreement centered on the differences between "serious bodily harm" and "serious bodily injury", and the proper uses of instructions on the two terms. The Montana Supreme Court said that the test is whether the instructions given on justifiable force gave the defendant ample opportunity to expound to the jury in argument his theory with respect to the use of force as self-defense against an unlawful act. The court found the test had been passed in this case. Further, the court agreed that "harm" and "injury" are not necessarily synonymous and that there is no indication that the Legislature intended to integrate the definition of "serious bodily injury" into the self-defense statute. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Polygraph Test Results — Admissibility — Expert Testimony of Polygraphists: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case appealed the trial court's granting of a motion in limine to prevent the introduction of expert testimony regarding polygraph test results of a friend of the defendant who had accompanied the defendant as a passenger in the defendant's car on the night of the shooting. The defendant alleged three grounds for this part of his appeal: (1) the trial court erred in refusing to hear defendant's offer of proof on the polygraph; (2) that the trial court erred in ruling that the proposed testimony was inadmissible as a matter of law; and (3) the trial court erred in refusing admission of the particular polygraph-related testimony offered by the defendant. The Supreme Court said that if the trial judge's ruling that as a matter of law the testimony of the polygraph examiner was inadmissible was a correct ruling, it was not error for the District Court to refuse to consider the defendant's offer of proof or for it to refuse to admit into evidence this particular area of testimony and evidence. The Montana rule is that the results of polygraph examinations are not admissible as evidence in a criminal trial. The polygraph test results in this case do not fall into the same category as other scientific evidence that is admissible to assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue. Here only the friend's understanding of the defendant's motives could be established by the test, and that was not an issue in the case. For these reasons it was not error for the trial court to rule that as a matter of law the evidence was inadmissible. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Suppression Question — Psychological Evaluation — Standard of Review: Where two expert witnesses present conflicting evidence during a suppression hearing as to results of psychological evaluations they performed of the defendant and the District Court finds one expert's testimony to be more credible than the other's, such determination will be disturbed on appeal only if it is not supported by substantial credible evidence. In re R.P.S., 188 M 317, 613 P2d 999 (1980), following St. v. Grimestad, 183 M 29, 598 P2d 198 (1979).

Sandstrom Instruction — Plain Error Rule: The Sandstrom instruction was given to the jury in an action charging Martinez with theft. The instruction was not objected to at trial but was raised on appeal. The Supreme Court invoked the "plain error" rule because of the use of a constitutionally defective jury instruction and reversed the conviction. St. v. Martinez, 188 M 271, 613 P2d 974 (1980).

Improper Sentencings — Excess of Maximum — Failure to Prove Essential Element: Where the District Court sentenced defendant to 20 years for burglary and the maximum possible sentence was 10 years, the Supreme Court reduced the sentence to 10 years. The Supreme Court also reversed the 10-year sentence the defendant received upon his conviction for felony theft, as the State failed to prove the essential element that the value of the property taken exceeded $150. All other sentences received by the defendant, as well as the provision of the sentence for no parole or work furlough, were within the maximum allowed by law and as such were within the discretion of the sentencing judge and were not overturned. St. v. Sunday, 187 M 292, 609 P2d 1188 (1980).

Increased Sentence: The District Court may increase the sentence or punishment imposed by a Justice of the Peace after a trial de novo on a misdemeanor charge. St. v. Fissette, 159 M 501, 498 P2d 1208 (1972), following Colten v. Ky., 405 US 913, 32 L Ed 2d 584, 92 S Ct 1953 (1971).

Source of Subsection (1): M.R.App.P., [former] Rule 14 [now superseded]. The language of the last sentence of [former] Rule 14 was changed to make it more consistent with the language presently used.

Source of Subsection (2): Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, [section] 121-9. This provision is consistent with present Montana law. Its purpose is to prevent a failure of justice where there are defects in the appeal but the substantial rights of the parties have not been affected. If error exists which affects the substantial rights of the accused, then the decision should be reversed even though not brought to the attention of the trial court. This is the present law. The object of this section is to get the problem settled in the state court rather than in a federal court.

Hearsay Evidence Improperly Admitted — Hearsay Statements Repeated Prior Admissible In-Court Testimony — Right to Fair Trial by Impartial Jury Not Violated by Court's Refusal to Interview Juror Who Talked to Witness — Repeated Playing of Recorded Jail Phone Calls to Jury Encouraged by Defendant — Record Insufficient for Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Cumulative Error Doctrine. St. v. Oliver, 2022 MT 104, 408 Mont. 519, 510 P.3d 1218.

Motion to Allow Incarcerated Defense Witness to Testify in Civilian Clothes Denied — Witness Testified in Orange Jumpsuit and Shackles — Ruling Affirmed. St. v. Rossbach, 2022 MT 2, 407 Mont. 55, 501 P.3d 914.

Failure to Object to Jury Instruction — Waiver Due to Untimeliness: A defendant made a posttrial jury instruction and argued that it was reviewable on appeal pursuant to 46-20-104 and 46-20-701 because it was made “during trial” under St. v. Reichmand, 2010 MT 228, 358 Mont. 68, 243 P.3d 423, in which the Supreme Court announced that “during trial” encompassed the entire proceeding in the lower court. The Supreme Court noted that in addition to being made “during trial”, an objection must also be timely. In this case, the grounds for objection were apparent before the jury was instructed, so the objection was untimely when the defendant failed to object contemporaneously and instead raised it following the verdict. St. v. Hamilton, 2018 MT 253, 393 Mont. 102, 428 P.3d 849.

Claim of Ineffective Assistance for Not Seeking Lesser Included Offense — Issues for Postconviction Relief Proceeding Based on Insufficient Record: After the defendant was convicted of attempted sexual intercourse without consent, he claimed that he received ineffective assistance of counsel given that his counsel did not seek a lesser included offense instruction. Citing St. v. Clary, 2012 MT 26, 364 Mont. 53, 270 P.3d 88, the Supreme Court determined that the record failed to provide a sufficient explanation for the actions of the defendant’s counsel, and therefore the issues were deemed to be better examined within a postconviction relief proceeding. St. v. Bishop, 2012 MT 259, 367 Mont. 10, 291 P.3d 538. See also St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 Mont. 58, 30 P.3d 340, and St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 Mont. 92, 167 P.3d 906.

Appeal From Justice’s Court — District Court to Review Brady Claims on Merits or to Order Further Proceedings in Justice’s Court: The defendant was convicted of misdemeanor partner or family member assault in Justice’s Court and appealed to the District Court. On appeal, the defendant attempted for the first time to introduce text messages between him and the victim that he believed were exculpatory, alleging that he had not introduced them at his trial because he assumed the state was going to. The District Court concluded that its appellate review was limited to the records of the Justice’s Court and therefore it could not consider the text messages. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed with the District Court, ruling that when a District Court is confronted with possibly exculpatory evidence that was not introduced at trial, the District Court has authority either to consider the merits of the evidence or to remand the matter to the Justice’s Court. The Supreme Court then considered the merits of the allegedly exculpatory evidence. The court concluded that the defendant did not establish a prima facie Brady claim because the evidence had not been suppressed by the state and that moreover, the defendant, who was the recipient and the sender of the text messages, was aware of the evidence before trial. The Supreme Court also concluded that given the extent of the inculpatory evidence offered at trial, the introduction of the text messages would not have resulted in the defendant’s acquittal. St. v. Ellison, 2012 MT 50, 364 Mont. 276, 272 P.3d 646.

Lower Court’s Refusal to Grant Immunity to Proposed Witness Not Grounds for New Trial: The defendant argued that the ability to present a defense was adversely affected by the District Court’s refusal to grant immunity to a proposed witness. The Supreme Court pointed out that the defendant, in making the request for immunity, had failed to provide the District Court with an offer of proof regarding the proposed witness’s testimony or to explain why the witness needed immunity. The Supreme Court held that it could only speculate as to the contents of the intended testimony and that it would not find error on the lower court’s part based upon speculation and lack of information. St. v. St. Dennis, 2010 MT 229, 358 Mont. 88, 244 P.3d 292.

Appeal of Warrantless Recording of Conversation — Submission at Any Time Case Not Yet Final: Prior to a sentencing hearing for a drug conviction by a jury based in part on the warrantless recording of conversations by an informant, the defendant appealed the admission of the recordings based upon the Supreme Court’s ruling on warrantless recordings in St. v. Goetz, 2008 MT 296, 345 Mont. 421, 191 P.3d 489. The District Court denied the motion based on the Supreme Court’s decisions in St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008 MT 397, 347 Mont. 164, 197 P.3d 1004, and St. v. Foston, 2009 MT 191, 351 Mont. 85, 209 P.3d 262, that to be similarly situated as the defendant in Goetz so as to justify a retroactive application of Goetz the defendant must have objected to the recording prior to or during the trial. The Supreme Court reversed its decisions in Foster-DeBerry and Foston and held that a defendant would be considered similarly situated as the defendant in Goetz so long as the defendant’s case is pending, on direct review, or not yet final. St. v. Reichmand, 2010 MT 228, 358 Mont. 68, 243 P.3d 423.

Conviction Reversed Based on State’s Failure to Show That Error in Admitting Evidence Was Not Prejudicial: Prior to a sentencing hearing for a drug conviction by a jury based in part on the warrantless recording of conversations by an informant, the defendant appealed the admission of the recordings based upon the Supreme Court’s ruling on warrantless recordings in St. v. Goetz, 2008 MT 296, 345 Mont. 421, 191 P.3d 489. The District Court denied the motion. The Supreme Court reversed the conviction and remanded for a new trial on the basis that the state had failed to meet its burden and show that the introduction of the recordings had in no way contributed to the defendant's conviction. St. v. Reichmand, 2010 MT 228, 358 Mont. 68, 243 P.3d 423.

Failure of Counsel to Move for Dismissal or Reduced Charges Based on Lack of Physical Evidence — Record-Based Claim Subject to Postconviction Review: Taylor contended on appeal that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for dismissal or reduction of a rape charge based on the absence of rape examination evidence. However, the record showed no explanation of the reasons for counsel's omissions. Therefore, consideration of the issue was not appropriate for direct appeal, but rather was best suited for postconviction review. The Supreme Court declined to address why counsel chose to proceed as he did and dismissed Taylor's appeal of this issue without prejudice. St. v. Taylor, 2010 MT 94, 356 Mont. 167, 231 P.3d 79.

Prosecutor's Closing Comments Not Improper or Prejudicial — No Prosecutorial Misconduct in Referencing Defendant's Evidence: Dewitz contended that the prosecutor committed misconduct in closing arguments by referencing a plea agreement entered by an alleged accomplice. However, the plea agreement was entered into evidence by defense counsel in an effort to show that the alleged accomplice was not credible, so Dewitz could not complain of the prosecutor's reference to evidence that Dewitz introduced. Nor did Dewitz demonstrate how the comments could be considered improper or prejudicial. The prosecutor's comments were not so egregious as to deprive Dewitz of a fair trial, so no misconduct occurred. St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009).

Incarceration of Mentally Ill Defendant — No Plain Error Review for Alleged Due Process Violation: Following Rovin's parole violations, the District Court revoked Rovin's suspended sentence and imposed a sentence in the state prison, despite the fact that Rovin suffered from mental illness. Rovin argued for the first time on appeal that incarceration would fail to achieve rehabilitation and thus violated due process, that the Supreme Court should invoke plain error review to address the constitutional violation, and that failure to do so would be a manifest miscarriage of justice. The Supreme Court declined. Rovin failed to demonstrate that the due process claim met the elements for plain error review. The District Court considered sentencing alternatives but rejected community-based treatment over concerns for the safety of Rovin and the public. Rovin was represented at every stage of the proceedings, knowingly and voluntarily admitted the parole violations, and waived the right to appeal by failing to object at trial. Further, a mere assertion that failure to review a claimed error might result in a manifest miscarriage of justice is not sufficient to implicate plain error review. St. v. Rovin, 2009 MT 16, 349 M 57, 201 P3d 780 (2009), following St. v. Mackrill, 2008 MT 297, 345 M 469, 191 P3d 451 (2008).

Failure to Develop Legal Analysis Regarding Warrantless Recorded Telephone Conversation — Issue Not Considered on Appeal: Jones moved the District Court to suppress a tape-recorded telephone conversation that was conducted as part of a drug investigation, but the court denied the motion. On appeal, Jones asserted that the Supreme Court should apply its decision from two cases that were pending at the time of Jones's trial. However, Jones failed to present any legal analysis of the factors applicable to the issue of whether an unlawful search occurred or to discuss other precedents that might apply. The Supreme Court declined to conduct Jones's research or to develop legal analysis supporting Jones's position. Jones failed to establish District Court error, and denial of the motion to suppress was affirmed. St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), following St. v. Hicks, 2006 MT 71, 331 M 471, 133 P3d 206 (2006).

What Constitutes Similarly Situated Case for Purposes of Retroactive Application of New Rule — Issue Required to Be Raised in Trial Court: As a general principle, in order for a case to be similarly situated for purposes of retroactive application of a newly announced rule, the issue addressed by the new rule should be raised by the movant at the trial court level and properly preserved for appeal. The only exception would be a challenge under the common-law plain error doctrine or if unique circumstances apply, such as those in St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P3d 1001 (2005). Here, Foster-DeBerry contended that the new rule regarding suppression of telephone and transmission recordings announced in St. v. Goetz & St. v. Hamper, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), should retroactively apply to Foster-DeBerry's case, which was pending when the Goetz-Hamper rule was announced. However, Foster-DeBerry never filed a motion to suppress or raised the legal issues addressed in Goetz-Hamper in trial court, and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal, so Foster-DeBerry was not entitled to retroactive application of the Goetz-Hamper rule. Further, Foster-DeBerry did not argue for application of the plain error doctrine, so the Supreme Court declined to apply it. St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008 MT 397, 347 M 164, 197 P3d 1004 (2008), following Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 US 314 (1987), and St. v. Zivcic, 598 NW2d 565 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999), and overruled, to the extent that it requires objection to warrantless recordings to be made at trial, by St. v. Reichmand, 2010 MT 228, 358 Mont. 68, 243 P.3d 423.

Length of Speedy Trial Interval When Dismissal Granted: The date that a court grants a speedy trial dismissal motion becomes the date of the case's disposition and the end date of the speedy trial interval for purposes of appeal. St. v. Billman, 2008 MT 326, 346 M 118, 194 P3d 58 (2008).

No Record as to Why Counsel Took Particular Actions in Providing Defense — Effective Assistance Claim Not Appropriate for Direct Appeal: Hamilton claimed that he received ineffective assistance of counsel at a trial on incest charges, asserting that counsel: (1) failed to deliver on the promise that Hamilton would testify; (2) allowed a detective to testify regarding the veracity of Hamilton and the alleged victim; and (3) demeaned Hamilton and defense counsel in closing statements. The Supreme Court examined each claim but was unable to determine from the record why counsel took that particular strategy. Because the claims were not record-based, the effective assistance issue was not appropriate for direct appeal, and Hamilton's claim was dismissed without prejudice to raising the claim in postconviction relief proceedings. St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P3d 906 (2007), following St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001). See also Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523, and St. v. Rodriguez, 2021 MT 65, 403 Mont. 360, 483 P.3d 1080.

Element of Crime Revealed Through Stipulation Entered for Strategic Reasons — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: At Auld's trial for witness tampering, defense counsel entered a stipulation revealing that Auld's parole officer, who was designated as a government employee, had or was about to engage in an investigation to determine if Auld had violated a rule by consuming alcohol. Auld asserted that counsel provided ineffective assistance by entering the stipulation and conceding an element of the offense of witness tampering. The Supreme Court found Auld's argument unavailing. Counsel entered the stipulation for strategic reasons so that the jury would not hear that Auld was on parole at the time that the offense took place, and Auld could not use trial tactics and strategic decisions as a basis for an ineffective assistance of counsel claim. St. v. Auld, 2006 MT 189, 333 M 125, 142 P3d 753 (2006). See also St. v. Gixti, 2005 MT 296, 329 M 330, 124 P3d 177 (2005), and St. v. Worthan, 2006 MT 147, 332 M 401, 138 P3d 805 (2006).

Motion to Correct Sentence Not Considered Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Plain Error Review of Nolo Contendere Plea Inappropriate: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds. Pursuant to a subsequent plea agreement, Holt pleaded nolo contendere to the contested counts, but reserved the right to withdraw the plea if the agreed sentences were not imposed. Following conviction, Holt asked the Supreme Court to exercise plain error review, find that the plea agreement was violated, and allow Holt to withdraw the nolo contendere guilty plea. The court declined. Holt made no motion in trial court to review the guilty plea, so that issue was not properly before the Supreme Court. Holt's speculation that he would not have entered the plea agreement had he considered the possibility of good time did not implicate Holt's fundamental constitutional rights, and failure to apply plain error review did not result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the proceedings, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. The Supreme Court refused to consider Holt's District Court motion to correct the sentence as a motion to withdraw the guilty plea and thus declined to consider Holt's argument that he be allowed to withdraw the nolo contendere plea based on plain error review. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006), distinguishing St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

No Appellate Review of Trial Court's Refusal to Allow Expert Testimony Absent Contemporaneous Objection: During Olsen's arson trial, Olsen sought to introduce testimony from a chemical engineer who had concluded that a faulty junction box was the cause of the fire. After voir dire to determine the engineer's qualifications to testify, the District Court granted the state's motion to exclude the engineer's testimony on grounds that he lacked the necessary expertise to testify on the subject of forensic electrical engineering. Olsen made no offer of proof regarding the witness's qualifications to testify or the substance of the testimony, nor did Olsen object to the refusal to allow the testimony. Nevertheless, on appeal, Olsen contended that the trial court erred in disallowing the testimony. The Supreme Court held that Olsen's failure to make a contemporaneous objection at trial constituted waiver of the objection, so the issue was not subject to appellate review. St. v. Olsen, 2004 MT 158, 322 M 1, 92 P3d 1204 (2004).

Hybrid Standard of Supreme Court Review of Sentencing When Offender Ineligible for Review by Sentence Review Division: In St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937 (1999), the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, discarding the previous two-tiered approach of reviewing sentences for both legality and abuse of discretion, which was considered a carryover from the days before the creation of the Sentence Review Division when the court reviewed all sentencing challenges. However, Montoya created a “no review” window once the Sentence Review Division came into being, which left offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions, but no term of incarceration and thus no eligibility for Sentence Review Division consideration, without a remedy. Therefore, the court fashioned a hybrid standard of review to close the “no review” window. If an offender is sentenced to 1 year or more of actual incarceration and is eligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will apply the Montoya standard and review the sentence for legality only, but if the offender is ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), followed in St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

Failure of Trial Court to Hold Hearing Regarding Juror’s Acquaintance With Witness — Waiver Absent Timely Objection — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: During voir dire at Davis’s trial, several jurors indicated that they were acquainted with two witnesses but stated that their acquaintance would not affect their ability to sit as jurors. Immediately after the first witness was called, a juror stated to the court that he knew the witness. Without objection from Davis, the court noted the statement and the witness proceeded to testify. Following conviction, Davis appealed on grounds that the court should have held a hearing to determine whether the juror was biased and that failure to do so violated Davis’s right to an impartial jury. The Supreme Court disagreed. Davis’s failure to object at trial constituted a waiver of appellate review of the issue. Further, Davis did not meet the narrow criteria in St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), to warrant plain error review. Judgment was affirmed. St. v. Davis, 2003 MT 341, 318 M 459, 81 P3d 484 (2003), followed in St. v. Taylor, 2009 MT 161, 350 M 447, 208 P3d 422 (2009).

Right to Appeal Without Objection at Trial Applicable Only When Right Determined to Be Retroactive — Hall Decision on Flight Instruction Prospective Only: In St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929 (1999), the Supreme Court ruled that a jury instruction on the significance of flight should no longer be given because it could be an unnecessary comment on the evidence by the trial court. Although he did not raise a “Hall-type” objection to a flight instruction at trial, Nolan asserted that he was entitled to consideration of a Hall-related claim on appeal pursuant to this section because his constitutional right to a fair trial was violated by the giving of the flight instruction, constituting prejudicial error. The Supreme Court disagreed. One condition for application of this section is that the right asserted in the claim did not exist at the time of trial and has been determined to be retroactive in application. The ruling in Hall was prospective, not retroactive, and Nolan’s trial occurred prior to the Hall decision; thus, Nolan did not meet the requirements of this section for raising a claimed constitutional error on appeal to which an objection was not made at trial. St. v. Nolan, 2003 MT 13, 314 M 47, 62 P3d 1118 (2003).

No Presumption of Prejudice:

Prejudice in a criminal case will not be presumed, but rather must appear from the denial or invasion of a substantial right from which the law imputes prejudice. St. v. Nelson, 2002 MT 122, 310 M 71, 48 P3d 739 (2002); St. v. Stuit, 277 M 227, 921 P2d 866, 53 St. Rep. 607 (1996); St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290, 51 St. Rep. 1238 (1994); St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994); St. v. Staat, 248 M 291, 811 P2d 1261, 48 St. Rep. 1041 (1991); St. v. Newman, 242 M 315, 790 P2d 971, 47 St. Rep. 711 (1990); St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988); St. v. Brush, 228 M 247, 741 P2d 1333, 44 St. Rep. 1495 (1987); St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981); St. v. Bubnash, 142 M 377, 382 P2d 830 (1963); St. v. Straight, 136 M 255, 347 P2d 482 (1959); St. v. Hall, 55 M 182, 175 P 267 (1918). Stuit was followed in St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827, 56 St. Rep. 1 (1999).

Where the trial court mistakenly granted challenges for cause to the prosecution but denied a similar challenge by defendant, the court held that prejudice will not be presumed where the record shows that the trial court’s error affected neither constitutional nor jurisdictional rights of the defendant, and defendant on appeal has failed to demonstrate prejudice to his substantial rights resulting from the error. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982).

It ought no longer to be the rule in criminal cases in this state that, error being shown, prejudice will be presumed, as was held prior to 1895 when the codes were adopted. The former practice resulted in altogether too many reversals of criminal cases for technical errors which did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Byrd, 41 M 585, 111 P 407 (1910); St. v. Gordon, 35 M 458, 90 P 173 (1907).

Failure to Object at Trial Constituting Waiver of Right to Claim Prosecutorial Misconduct on Appeal: Azure argued on appeal that the state committed prosecutorial misconduct by introducing allegedly false evidence during Azure's homicide trial regarding threats that Azure allegedly made toward the victim's brother on the night of the shooting. However, Azure made no contemporaneous objection to the testimony during trial, which constituted a waiver of Azure's right to appellate review of the claim. St. v. Azure, 2002 MT 22, 308 M 201, 41 P3d 899 (2002). See also St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271 (1992), and St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290 (1994).

No Review on Direct Appeal of Allegation of Improper Jury Impanelment Absent Objection at Trial: Azure appealed a conviction for deliberate homicide on grounds that the jury was unlawfully impaneled, citing St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000). Azure noted that he was tried 2 months after Lamere, in the same judicial district, and that it was probable that the same improper jury impanelment used in Lamere was used in Azure's case, making Azure's trial illegal as well. Azure asked the Supreme Court to remand for factfinding on the issue, because no record was made as to how the jury was impaneled. The Supreme Court declined to remand. Remanding for a hearing is not a proper remedy for an appeal on direct review, because an evidentiary hearing can be accomplished only in a postconviction hearing. It could not be determined from the record what procedure was used to summon the jury, so the issue could not be reviewed. Further, review pursuant to the plain error doctrine was not available, because there was no record for the Supreme Court to review to determine whether an error occurred, let alone if the error met the criteria of plain error under the common law or this section. St. v. Azure, 2002 MT 22, 308 M 201, 41 P3d 899 (2002).

Record-Based or Nonrecord-Based Information Determinative of Appropriateness of Direct Appeal or Petition for Postconviction Relief — Direct Appeal Dismissed When Record Insufficient to Substantiate Effectiveness of Counsel: In 1999, White moved for an evidentiary hearing to allow the development of facts that were not part of the record but that were necessary to sustain a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court declared by order that a petition for postconviction relief would be the proper avenue for White's nonrecord-based ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Nevertheless, in late 2000, White appealed, contending that the claim of prejudicial error resulting from her trial counsel's various failures to provide representation, such as the failure to call witnesses, make an opening statement, or offer a theory of the case at any stage of the proceedings, was supported by the record and proper for direct appeal. The general rule set out in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), is that when ineffective assistance claims are based on facts of record, they must be raised on direct appeal, while claims based on allegations not documented in the record must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. The underlying principle of the rule is that a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance. The two distinct classifications of on-record and off-record actions tend to overlap at times, and though not easily distilled into a formula, the definitive question that decides whether actions are on-record or off-record is whether the record fully explains why counsel took the particular course of action. Generally, an alleged failure to object to the introduction of evidence, to the testimony of a witness, or to prosecutorial misconduct at trial is considered record-based and appropriate for direct appeal. Likewise, counsel's own conduct in presenting the case, such as improperly eliciting damaging testimony from a witness or rendering an improper opening statement or closing argument, may be pointed to as record-based. Decisions regarding the timing and number of objections and whether to offer no opening statement at all lie within counsel's tactical discretion, indicating that nonrecord-based information explaining the tactic may be involved. Similarly, counsel's failure to adequately investigate, to prepare a defense, to become familiar with critical areas of the applicable law, to offer a particular jury instruction, to object to the trial court's failure to consider sentencing alternatives, to object to the admission of evidence that is evidenced by the record, or to fully inform defendant of the consequences of various options and rights, even though the prejudicial results of the ineffectiveness appear on the record, may constitute a nonrecord-based claim. In White's case, the record supplied some indicia of why a certain objection was raised at a particular time, but was still insufficient to determine to what extent counsel's actions were purely tactical or resulted from deficient representation. Thus, the information was considered nonrecord-based and should have been raised by petition for postconviction relief, so White's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice. St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Earl, 2003 MT 158, 316 M 263, 71

P3d 1201 (2003), St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), St. v. Notti, 2003 MT 296, 318 M 146, 79 P3d 289 (2003), St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003), St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005), Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006), St. v. Herman, 2008 MT 187, 343 M 494, 188 P3d 978 (2008), and St. v. Mikesell, 2021 MT 288, 406 Mont. 205, 498 P.3d 192. See also St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003), and St. v. Davis, 2003 MT 341, 318 M 459, 81 P3d 484 (2003). See also St. v. Adgeron, 2003 MT 284, 318 M 22, 78 P3d 850 (2003), for a similar application of the Hagen rule. See also St. v. St. Germain, 2007 MT 28, 336 M 17, 153 P3d 591 (2007), in which the Supreme Court declined to address a direct appeal of defense counsel's nonrecord-based reasons for making a double jeopardy argument and for failing to call a witness to testify in an incest case because the issues were appropriate for postconviction proceedings. See also St. v. Green, 2009 MT 114, 350 M 141, 205 P3d 798 (2009), in which an ineffective counsel appeal based on counsel's failure to request an accomplice instruction in a homicide trial was dismissed in favor of postconviction relief proceedings because plausible justifications existed for counsel's conduct that could not be addressed on appeal since the record did not resolve the factual questions surrounding counsel's actions.

Objection to Qualifications of Pathologist to Testify Regarding Gunshot Wound: At Clausell's deliberate homicide trial, objection was made to the testimony of a Board-certified clinical pathologist who offered opinions regarding a gunshot wound, on grounds that the pathologist was not a Board-certified forensic pathologist and therefore was not qualified to testify. However, the doctor had performed over 400 autopsies, including about 40 that involved gunshot wounds. Clausell did not offer any applicable legal theory that a clinical pathologist with such experience who is not a forensic pathologist is not qualified to testify in a homicide case, and the Supreme Court declined to adopt a rule to that effect. Further, Clausell failed to preserve any other objection at trial to the pathologist's testimony and was precluded from raising other issues regarding the testimony on appeal. St. v. Clausell, 2001 MT 62, 305 M 1, 22 P3d 111 (2001), distinguishing In re K.H. & K.L.E., 1999 MT 128, 294 M 466, 981 P2d 1190 (1999).

Failure to Object at Trial to Refusal to Allow Testimony of Additional Witnesses After Trial Commenced — No Interference With Constitutional Right to Present Defense: LaDue contended that failure to allow the testimony of two additional witnesses after the start of his trial on charges of attempted deliberate homicide interfered with his constitutional right to present a defense. However, LaDue did not raise the constitutional question at trial, thus failing to preserve the issue for appeal. Failure to raise the issue at trial constituted waiver of the right to appeal it. St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

Common-Law Plain Error — Defendant Must Demonstrate With Specifics That a Fundamental Constitutional Right Was Violated at Trial: Whipple claimed that the trial court erred in allowing five witnesses to testify as to the credibility of the testimony of two minors who testified that Whipple had sexually abused them. The Supreme Court stated that because claims of plain error are almost always raised for the first time on appeal, a defendant must do more than simply make a generalized claim that the defendant's rights were violated by the alleged error. See St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996). The Supreme Court stated that it would not exercise its power of common-law plain error review of alleged errors not objected to at trial because Whipple had not met his burden of demonstrating specifically how a constitutional right of his had been violated by an error of the trial court. St. v. Whipple, 2001 MT 16, 304 M 118, 19 P3d 228 (2001).

Stipulation to Not Mention Suspended Driver's License at DUI Trial — Mention of Expired Driver's License Cured by Jury Admonition: Brady was charged with DUI, fourth or subsequent offense, arising from circumstances surrounding a single-vehicle accident in which Brady swerved off the highway, hit a rock wall, and rolled the vehicle. The information also charged Brady with three misdemeanors: driving while his license was suspended or revoked, failure to provide proof of insurance, and failure to give notice of an accident by the quickest means. Shortly before voir dire, Brady stated that he would plead guilty to the misdemeanors and moved that the state's witnesses not mention any of the offenses to which Brady would plead guilty. The state did not object to the motion. The third witness for the state, a deputy who was at the wreck scene, testified that he found a wallet near the vehicle that contained an expired driver's license. Brady moved for mistrial on grounds that the state violated the judge's order not to mention an expired license. The state countered that the stipulation was that the state would not mention that the license was suspended, but that mention of an expired license was not covered. The District Court found that there was a difference between the jury knowing that Brady's license was suspended, which suggested criminal activity, and knowing that the license was expired, which is not in itself criminal. The court then admonished the jury to disregard the testimony regarding the expired license as irrelevant to the case. Brady was convicted of DUI and appealed on grounds that denial of his motion for a mistrial was reversible error because the state's witness deliberately violated an order in limine to which the state previously stipulated. Granting a mistrial is appropriate when a reasonable possibility exists that inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction. The strength of the evidence against the defendant, together with the prejudicial influence of the inadmissible evidence and whether a cautionary jury instruction could cure any prejudice, must be considered in determining whether a prohibited statement contributed to the conviction. A mistrial should be denied for technical errors of defects that do not affect the defendant's substantial rights and when the record is sufficient to establish guilt. The Supreme Court agreed that there is a difference between an expired license and a suspended license with regard to implications of guilt. Here, any potential prejudice that might have resulted from testimony about the expired license was sufficiently cured by the admonition to the jury, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for mistrial. St. v. Brady, 2000 MT 282, 302 M 174, 13 P3d 941, 57 St. Rep. 1178 (2000), distinguishing St. v. Partin, 287 M 12, 951 P2d 1002 (1997). Brady was followed in St. v. White, 2008 MT 129, 343 M 66, 184 P3d 1008 (2008), with regard to denial of a mistrial when technical errors or defects do not affect a defendant's substantial rights and when the record is sufficient to establish guilt.

Failure to Raise Sentencing Objections Before District Court — Issue Not Preserved for Appeal: Tucker pleaded guilty to attempted aggravated assault with a weapon. At the sentencing hearing, Tucker argued that one of the sentencing exceptions applied to him because his mental capacity was impaired because of his transsexualism combined with the stress of his fiancée's custody battles. The District Court disagreed and added the minimum 2-year weapon enhancement to his sentence. At no time did Tucker complain to the court that its findings were inadequate under 46-18-223 or allege that the sentence was illegal, excessive, or improper. Instead, Tucker argued on appeal that the sentencing court erred as a matter of law in failing to state the reasons why the sentencing exception did not apply. The Supreme Court refused to remand for resentencing because Tucker failed to bring the allegations of sentencing error to the attention of the District Court in a timely manner. The purpose of the contemporaneous objection requirement is to give the District Court the first opportunity to correct any error. Failure to do so constitutes a waiver of the right to appeal the issue. St. v. Tucker, 2000 MT 255, 301 M 466, 10 P3d 832, 57 St. Rep. 1046 (2000).

Failure to Object to Conduct of Psychological Evaluation or to Continuation of Sentencing Hearing — Waiver of Right to Consideration on Appeal: Osterloth was convicted of felony sexual assault and was required to undergo a sexual offender evaluation by a therapist of his choice at county expense. His scheduled sentencing was continued to allow the evaluation. On appeal, Osterloth contended that the District Court erred by sentencing him without an evaluation prepared by a qualified therapist, pursuant to 46-18-111, and by continuing sentencing instead of conducting a sentencing hearing without delay, as required in 46-18-115. The Supreme Court noted that under 46-20-104, it is precluded from considering an alleged error unless a timely objection was made or the criteria of this section are met. Osterloth did not object to the evaluation being conducted by his own evaluator or to the sentencing continuation, nor did he assert that he could satisfy any of the requirements of this section. Thus, Osterloth waived the right to have the Supreme Court consider these alleged errors on appeal. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

Standard of Review of Criminal Sentence Clarified — Supreme Court Review of Legality of Sentence Only: In an effort to clear up a prevalent inconsistency in Montana case law regarding the appropriate standard of review of criminal sentences, the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, i.e., whether the sentence is within the parameters provided by statute, which in turn implies de novo review—a sentence is either legal or it is not. The court overruled St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982), St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997), and any other Montana decision that suggests that the Supreme Court will also review criminal sentences for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), followed in St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002). However, see St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), wherein the Supreme Court fashioned a hybrid standard of review for offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions but no term of incarceration who are ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division. In reviewing those sentences, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division.

Withdrawal of Proposed Instruction on Accountability — Waiver on Appeal: Sittner proposed a jury instruction stating that a defendant's knowledge that a crime is being committed, in conjunction with the defendant's presence during the crime, is insufficient to support a finding of guilt by accountability. The state's proposed instruction was that one may become an accomplice by being present and joining in the criminal act. Sittner withdrew his proposed instruction during settling of instructions, and the state's instruction was used. In the absence of a timely objection, Sittner's withdrawal of his proposed instruction constituted a waiver of the objection and precluded the raising of the issue on appeal, considering that none of the exceptions to the requirement for timely objection in this section applied. St. v. Sittner, 1999 MT 103, 294 M 302, 980 P2d 1053, 56 St. Rep. 434 (1999).

Motion In Limine Sufficient to Preserve Objection for Appeal: Defendant's motion in limine to exclude testimony regarding certain chemicals in his blood and bottles of prescription medication found in his car was sufficient to preserve the objection for appeal. The propriety of the admission of the evidence is a proper issue for the Supreme Court on appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998). See also St. v. Byrne, 2021 MT 238, 405 Mont. 352, 495 P.3d 440.

Mistrial Determinations — Trial Court and Supreme Court Standards: The Supreme Court recently clarified the standard to be applied by a trial court considering the grant of a mistrial by stating that a mistrial should be granted either when there is a demonstration of a manifest necessity or when a party has been denied a fair and impartial trial. The Supreme Court now adopts the rule that the manifest necessity part of the standard should be applied only if the trial court considers the grant of a mistrial when the allegedly injured party does not request or consent to a mistrial and that the denial of a fair and impartial trial part of the standard applies when the allegedly injured party does request or consent to a mistrial. As to the Supreme Court's standard of review of the District Court's ruling, the Supreme Court will no longer apply the standard of clear and convincing evidence that the trial court's ruling is erroneous. The standard to be applied is whether the trial court abused its discretion, clarifying St. v. Ford, 278 M 353, 926 P2d 245 (1996), St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717 (1996), and St. v. Walker, 280 M 346, 930 P2d 60 (1996). St. v. Partin, 287 M 12, 951 P2d 1002, 54 St. Rep. 1474 (1997), followed in St. v. Clark, 1998 MT 221, 290 M 479, 964 P2d 766, 55 St. Rep. 919 (1998), St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999), St. v. Weldele, 2003 MT 117, 315 M 452, 69 P3d 1162 (2003), and St. v. Moree, 2010 MT 148, 357 Mont. 24, 235 P.3d 585. See also St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453, 57 St. Rep. 734 (2000), in which it was held that the District Court did not err when it denied defendant's motion for mistrial based on trial testimony that the court had previously excluded in its order in limine because the objectionable testimony was not prejudicial, St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005), St. v. Dubois, 2006 MT 89, 332 M 44, 134 P3d 82 (2006), and St. v. White, 2008 MT 129, 343 M 66, 184 P3d 1008 (2008). Partin was distinguished, as to comments by the judge, in St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Evidence of Habit Disallowed — No Denial of Due Process and Right to Defense — Unspecific Objection — No Impairment of Substantial Rights by Comment of District Court on Merits of Defense: Huerta was tried on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of a juvenile and attempted to present evidence that it was the habit of the juvenile's mother to punish him severely. The District Court prevented the evidence from going to the jury. Huerta claimed that the District Court had prevented Huerta from presenting his only defense and thereby prevented him from obtaining a fair trial, in violation of his right to due process under the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and his right to a defense under the sixth amendment. The Supreme Court noted that the claim of denial of a constitutional right was made for the first time on appeal and, citing St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477 (1995), and St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592 (1996), held that Huerta had not made a specific enough objection when he objected at trial to a "miscarriage of justice". The Supreme Court also held that the District Court erred when it commented before the jury that "Brenda . . . is not on trial here". However, the Supreme Court held, as it noted that it had in St. v. Cassill, 71 M 274, 229 P 716 (1924), that under the circumstances, Huerta had received a fair trial and that his substantial rights were not prejudiced by the remark of the District Court. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 283, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Issue of Untested Breath Test Solution Raised for First Time on Appeal: Appellant, convicted of DUI, raised for the first time on appeal a claim that a newspaper reported that untested ethyl alcohol, used to calibrate Intoxilyzers, was distributed to the Sheriff's office that tested him and that his conviction should be reversed because the solution used to calibrate the Intoxilyzer used on him was not approved as required by rule. He did not show that the untested solution was actually in use at the time that his breath sample was taken. He assumed that the solution was in use based on the news article. The statute providing for review of material and controlling facts that were not known to a defendant and that could not have been ascertained by the exercise of reasonable diligence was not applicable. Review of the issue would require the appellate court to conduct a hearing and act as a finder of fact, and the District Court had not decided the question of whether the untested solution was used for appellant's breath test. St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994, 54 St. Rep. 542 (1997).

Failure to Object and Failure to Invoke Exception — Waiver of Objection: Martin was charged with several counts of sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, and deviate sexual conduct. Martin sought to have the counts severed in such a manner that five separate trials would have been required, but the District Court refused to sever. Martin argued before the Supreme Court that he was prejudiced by action of the prosecutor. The Supreme Court held that because Martin had made no objection at trial to any of the alleged instances of misconduct and because he did not argue that he was entitled to raise the arguments pursuant to subsection (2) of this section, the Supreme Court would not address the arguments of misconduct. St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996).

Clarification of Manifest Necessity Doctrine: Recognizing that the manifest necessity doctrine had not been consistently applied since being invoked in St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940 (1981), the Supreme Court clarified the standard by which to review the denial of a motion for mistrial, holding that a mistrial motion will be granted only when there is either a demonstration of manifest necessity or when the defendant has been denied a fair and impartial trial. St. v. Ford, 278 M 353, 926 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 947 (1996).

Evidence of Flight as Showing Guilt: Evidence of defendant's flight after an offense occurs may be admitted as a circumstance tending to show consciousness of guilt. Having found that the charged crimes occurred, the trial judge properly considered evidence of defendant's flight in reaching the conclusion that defendant was the one who committed the crimes. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Claim First Made on Appeal That Judge Should Not Have Questioned Witness or Curtailed Line of Prosecution Questioning: In a prosecution for aggravated kidnapping and assault, the judge's questions to a witness who sold defendant bullets and curtailing of a line of questioning pursued by the prosecution would not be considered on appeal because they were not raised below. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Claim First Made on Appeal That Judge Who Decided Issue of Flight in Bail Hearing Should Not Have Tried Case Because Flight Was an Issue: Defendant claimed that the lower court judge should not have tried his case because whether he had fled the jurisdiction was a seriously disputed question at trial. The judge had previously decided during a bail hearing that defendant was a flight risk. Defendant's contention that the judge was not truly impartial was precluded by statute from being decided on appeal because it was not raised below. The common-law plain error doctrine is an exception to the statute, but it is a doctrine that will be invoked only in exceptional cases in which failure to review the claimed error might result in manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of fundamental fairness at trial, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. It was determined inapplicable in this case. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Issues Not Raised on Appeal Barred by Statute — Scope of Bar: Brown was convicted of felony assault (now assault with a weapon), and the conviction was affirmed on appeal. Brown then filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming ineffective assistance of his appellate counsel and that the introduction of certain evidence at trial violated his fourth and fifth amendment rights. In his petition for postconviction relief, Brown acknowledged that the constitutional issues were not raised on appeal but argued that the statutory bar should not apply because he tried to raise the issues, but neither his trial nor appellate counsels did so. Citing St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54 (1995), the Supreme Court held that because Brown's appellate counsel properly applied that law (concluding that issues not raised at trial could not be raised on appeal) and because the statutory language barring issues that "could reasonably have been raised on direct appeal" included issues not properly preserved at trial, Brown was precluded from raising those issues in a petition for postconviction relief. Brown v. St., 277 M 430, 922 P2d 1146, 53 St. Rep. 692 (1996). See also St. v. Beckman, 284 M 459, 944 P2d 756, 54 St. Rep. 977 (1997), and Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

General Objection to Judicial Notice Insufficient to Preserve Issue on Appeal: Loh was charged with criminal possession of a controlled substance and sought to have her confession suppressed. The District Court denied the motion to suppress, and Loh was tried on the charge. At the trial, the prosecution requested the District Court to take judicial notice of the testimony of several firefighters given at the suppression hearing. The District Court agreed, over Loh's objection, saying that judicial notice of that former testimony was the very purpose contemplated by Rule 201, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The Supreme Court held that the general objection made by Loh's counsel at the suppression hearing was an insufficient objection. The Supreme Court also noted that if there was error, it was harmless error and that Loh failed to make a further objection as to the sufficiency of any evidence offered at trial. St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Failure to Object Bars Issues on Appeal — Designation as Dangerous Offender — Order for Alcohol Treatment — Failure to Advise Maximum Penalty: Hofman pleaded guilty to a felony and, at the conclusion of the sentencing hearing, was designated a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) and was ordered to undergo alcohol treatment. Hofman appealed the designation and the order and, in addition, alleged that the District Court failed to advise him of the maximum penalties for his offense. The Supreme Court held that Hofman's failure to raise these issues in the District Court precluded the issues from being raised on appeal. St. v. Hofman, 275 M 455, 913 P2d 1256, 53 St. Rep. 223 (1996).

DNA Evidence — General Objection in Motion In Limine Insufficient to Preserve Objection for Purposes of Appeal: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based in part upon DNA evidence that was combined with standard serological evidence to provide a combined statistical estimate of the probability that Weeks was the father of a child of his stepdaughter. Weeks objected to the combined evidence but not on a foundation basis. The state argued that Weeks waived any objection that he had to the combined evidence, but Weeks contended that his motion in limine preserved an objection to the evidence. The Supreme Court held that Weeks's motion in limine, which did not specify any reasons or authorities why the evidence should be excluded, did not contain an objection to the combined statistical evidence but simply concluded that the DNA evidence was prejudicial. The Supreme Court held that this objection was insufficient to preserve the issue for appeal. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995), followed in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996), and St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996).

Lack of Omnibus Hearing Not Prejudicial — Adequate Notice and Presentation of Case: Defendant claimed error because no omnibus hearing was held in his criminal case, which prejudiced his opportunities for preparation of a timely defense and led to surprise when the state attempted to introduce certain physical evidence at trial. One of the purposes of the omnibus hearing is to discuss the use of evidence regarding other bad acts. In this case, the acts were other sexual assaults defendant had purportedly committed. Twenty days before trial, the state gave notice to defendant, pursuant to St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), of its intent to use the evidence of other bad acts, which constituted ample notice and opportunity for defendant to prepare for that evidence. Defendant's claim of lack of ability to confront the witness failed because the Van Pelt exception to the rape shield law did not apply in this case because the defendant did not contend that the victim made accusations that had been adjudicated as false prior to trial. Defendant's argument of surprise also failed because even though he was not made aware at an omnibus hearing of the state's intent to introduce the rape victim's clothing as evidence, his objection to introduction of the evidence at trial was sustained and the evidence excluded. Defendant was not prejudiced by the lack of an omnibus hearing. St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994).

Evidence of Defense Witness's Prior Criminal History Not Admissible — Conviction Overturned: In a prosecution for accountability for aggravated kidnapping, the District Court allowed the state to cross-examine the defendant's witness as to the witness's prior criminal history. The Supreme Court found this to be reversible error on the grounds that there is a reasonable possibility that the inherently prejudicial and inadmissible evidence of the witness's criminal history might have contributed to the defendant's conviction. St. v. Bristow, 267 M 170, 882 P2d 1041, 51 St. Rep. 1010 (1994).

Refusal to Consider Validity of Complaint for Cruelty to Animals Raised for First Time on Appeal: Walter shot a dog on March 7, 1993, and was subsequently convicted of misdemeanor cruelty to animals under 45-8-211. Walter defended on the basis that his actions were the result of actions of the dog's owner and that the complaint was invalid because the owner was guilty of unclean hands. The Supreme Court noted that the validity of the complaint was not raised at the District Court level and that the Supreme Court would not consider the defense for the first time on appeal because none of the exceptions to this section applied to the case. St. v. Walter, 266 M 429, 880 P2d 1346, 51 St. Rep. 903 (1994).

Claim of Error Not Within Exception — Waiver of Appellate Review: Defendant contended that the prosecutor's false comments precluded a fair trial. Unless claims of error fit within an exception to subsection (2) of this section, appeal is improper. Appellate review was waived in this case because: (1) the right to object existed at the time of trial; (2) evidence was not suppressed; and (3) material and controlling facts upon which the claim was predicated were known to defendant and his attorney. St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994), followed in St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290, 51 St. Rep. 1238 (1994).

Allegations of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Made on Direct Appeal — Review Confined to Record: Supreme Court review of a defendant's allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel in the context of a direct appeal is confined to the record. Claims requiring consideration of factual matters outside the record are therefore inappropriate on direct appeal. St. v. Bradley, 262 M 194, 864 P2d 787, 50 St. Rep. 1511 (1993); In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156, 48 St. Rep. 702 (1991); St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548, 48 St. Rep. 424 (1991), citing St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990). See also Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Alleged Court Error and Prosecutor Misconduct Not Objected to During Trial: Thompson argued that his conviction should be overturned because of errors by the District Court in instructing the jury and because of misconduct by the prosecutor during closing remarks. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had not objected during the trial and that the court would not implement the plain error doctrine because the defendant had made no showing that his rights had been substantially prejudiced. St. v. Thompson, 259 M 62, 853 P2d 1188, 50 St. Rep. 682 (1993).

Alleged Error in Instruction Given at Defendant's Request: The Supreme Court would not consider an alleged error in an instruction that was given at defendant's request. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Failure to Offer Voluntariness Instruction or Object to Lack of Voluntariness Instruction: Defendant who did not offer an instruction on voluntariness as an element of every crime or object to failure to give such an instruction was not entitled to review of the issue on appeal. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Refusal to Consider, in Absence of Objection, Discussion of Other Bad Acts Before Jury: The Supreme Court would not consider the issue on appeal in absence of objection at trial to discussion before the jury regarding whether evidence of other bad acts, which the court barred, should be admitted. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Reserving for Postconviction Relief — Ineffective Assistance Claim That May Be Made on Appeal: On appeal, a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel with respect to any matters in the record may not be reserved and later made in a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Failure to State Specific Grounds for Objection to Instruction on Lesser Included Offense as Waiver of Appeal: At the settlement conference for jury instructions, the state proposed a series of instructions that sought to include sexual assault as a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent. Defense counsel objected to the giving of the instruction but did not state specific reasons for the objection. The absence of a proper objection constituted waiver of the objection for appeal purposes, and thus the lesser included offense issue was not preserved for appeal. St. v. Ogle, 255 M 246, 841 P2d 1133, 49 St. Rep. 932 (1992).

Review of Criminal Appeal Limited to Record: The Supreme Court's review of allegations on direct appeal is limited to what is contained in the record, and the court will limit its inquiry only to those matters contained in the record. St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058, 49 St. Rep. 506 (1992).

Failure to Object to Late Admission of Swab Test Results — No Prejudice: Defendant contended that the delay in processing powder residue swab tests, resulting in the lack of availability of the test results until the fourth day of trial, constituted negligent suppression of exculpatory evidence and violated due process. However, defendant neglected to object to the evidence during trial or to move for a stay in proceedings until the results could be analyzed by defense experts. Absent a demonstration of prejudice or evidence that the conduct prevented defense claims from being raised, dismissal of the case was not warranted. St. v. McCord, 251 M 317, 825 P2d 194, 49 St. Rep. 53 (1992).

Not Taking Stand Due to Judge's Comments: The defendant appealed his conviction on the basis that he had not taken the stand because he had relied on certain comments of the trial court with respect to corroborative testimony. The Supreme Court held that the issue was not before it because the defendant had failed to object at the close of his trial. St. v. Kaczmarek, 243 M 456, 795 P2d 439, 47 St. Rep. 1319 (1990).

No Prejudice Through Order in Companion Case: In a companion case involving defendant's brother, the trial court, over the brother's objection, ordered the production of statements made by individuals whom the brother intended to call as witnesses, pursuant to 46-15-323. Pursuant to an order in his own case, defendant was required to produce the same information. Defendant did not object to the order in his own case and was precluded from raising the issue on appeal. Further, defendant lacked standing to assert the privilege that was alleged by his brother; the defendant did not demonstrate any prejudice to him as a result of the order in the companion case. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

What Questions Constitute Prosecutorial Misconduct: Defendant contended that statements asked of a witness by the County Attorney on cross-examination constituted prosecutorial misconduct and resulted in prejudice. In determining that the questions did not comprise misconduct, the Supreme Court cited sec. 3-5.7(d) of the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice (1986), which states that "[i]t is unprofessional conduct for a prosecutor to ask a question which implies the existence of a factual predicate for which a good faith belief is lacking". St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Defense of Statute of Limitations — Cannot Be Raised for First Time on Appeal: The defendant was charged with felony theft, but the trial court reduced the charge to misdemeanor theft during the trial in light of evidence as to the value of the stolen property. On appeal, the defendant argued that the 1-year statute of limitations for trying him on the misdemeanor charge had run. The Supreme Court ruled that the defense of the statute of limitations was jurisdictional, had to be asserted at the trial, and was waived if not asserted before appeal. St. v. Larson, 240 M 203, 783 P2d 416, 46 St. Rep. 2055 (1989).

Constitutionality Not Considered: Defendant alleged for the first time on appeal that 45-5-201 is unconstitutional because it fails to provide a parent, who may use reasonable and necessary force to restrain or correct his child under 45-3-107, with any guidance in determining what is or is not reasonable or necessary force. The Supreme Court refused to consider the allegation on appeal, since none of the exceptions of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) were found to apply. St. v. Probert, 221 M 476, 719 P2d 783, 43 St. Rep. 988 (1986).

Alleged Constitutional Violation — Prerequisites: Concerning an alleged constitutional violation (failure to allow defendant to confront witnesses by allowing hearsay evidence) when the error was not objected to at trial, a party must show prejudicial error and must satisfy one of the three requirements listed in 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) before the claim will be noticed on appeal. St. v. Cain, 220 M 509, 717 P2d 15, 43 St. Rep. 568 (1986), followed in St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028, 50 St. Rep. 335 (1993), and Forsyth v. Allison, 274 M 246, 908 P2d 205, 52 St. Rep. 1212 (1995).

Statement of Witness Outside Trial Record Not Fit for Direct Appeal — Remand: Defendant asserted ineffective assistance of trial counsel for failure to call a witness with exculpatory testimony. Since this allegation on appeal included a statement outside the trial record made by the witness in defense counsel's office, the court considered it an improper attempt to supplement the record on appeal and remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the issue of effective assistance of counsel, rather than considering the issue on direct appeal. St. v. Field, 215 M 361, 697 P2d 1339, 42 St. Rep. 431 (1985).

Invited Error: Section 45-5-104 is not ambiguous and does not fail to give a person notice of to what he must conform his conduct. The Supreme Court was disinclined to review a claim to that effect where the State charged and attempted to prove deliberate homicide and objected to any instruction on mitigated deliberate homicide or negligent homicide, and defense counsel convinced the judge to give instructions on those two offenses. Any errors alleged by defendant in that respect were thus invited. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Review of Sentence for Inequity:

Review of a sentence for mere inequity or disparity is for the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court, which will review only for legality of the sentence, under the abuse of discretion standard. St. v. Lloyd, 208 M 195, 676 P2d 229, 41 St. Rep. 263 (1984), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991). See also St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide and sentenced to 10 years and to an additional consecutive 5 years for the knowing use of a gun while committing the offense. At the time of sentencing, the court had discretion to make the 5 years run either consecutively or concurrently. Section 46-18-221, under which the 5 years was imposed, was later amended to require that a sentence under the section run consecutively. Defendant's contention on appeal that it was error to require the 5 years to run consecutively went to the equity of the requirement and not to its legality and should be directed to the Sentence Review Board rather than to the Supreme Court on appeal from the sentence. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Exhibits Attached to Brief on Appeal to Be Disregarded if Not Contained in Record: Where the defendant was convicted of forgery by the District Court and on appeal sought to challenge the adequacy of his counsel by attaching three exhibits to his appellate brief that were not included in the record on appeal, the Supreme Court held that the exhibits may not be considered on appeal, as the court may consider only those matters ascertainable from the record. St. v. Dess, 207 M 396, 674 P2d 501, 41 St. Rep. 31 (1984), followed in St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987). See also Kelly v. St., 2013 MT 21, 368 Mont. 309, 300 P.3d 120.

Pro Se Appeal Filed Without Briefs — General Review of Transcript on Court's Motion: Where the defendant made the defense of his deliberate homicide case difficult by failing to cooperate with his several attorneys, and after conviction was granted several extensions by the Supreme Court for filing a transcript and his first brief, but nevertheless failed to file a brief and specifications of error, the Supreme Court on its own motion reviewed the District Court transcript for typical kinds of errors and found: (1) that the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction as the defendant was convicted on the basis of his own testimony; (2) that there were no errors in the jury instructions given on the evidence and the elements of the crime; (3) that assistance of counsel was adequate and that the failure of defendant's counsel to subpoena evidence or witnesses was not relevant to the crime charged; and (4) that the statutory penalties for deliberate homicide with a dangerous weapon did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Graham, 206 M 49, 669 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 1499 (1983).

Inadmissible Evidence — Prejudicial Error Test: The test of prejudicial error requiring reversal of a conviction due to admission of inadmissible evidence is whether there is a reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction. St. v. Gray, 202 M 445, 659 P2d 255, 40 St. Rep. 199 (1983), followed in St. v. Brush, 228 M 247, 741 P2d 1333, 44 St. Rep. 1495 (1987), and St. v. McKeon, 282 M 397, 938 P2d 643, 54 St. Rep. 404 (1997).

Federal Habeas Corpus Standard of Review Inapplicable to Appeals: In an appeal by the defendant from his conviction of aggravated assault against two police officers, the Supreme Court declined to review the record to determine, as urged by the defendant, that no rational trier of fact could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant's actions were not justified as a matter of self-defense. The cases raised by the defendant urging this standard of review are cases applicable to federal habeas corpus review of a state court conviction. Those cases and that standard of review are not applicable to an appeal to the Supreme Court. St. v. Warnick, 202 M 120, 656 P2d 190, 39 St. Rep. 2369 (1982).

Failure to Raise Issue Below — Presence of Victim During Defendant's Testimony: Defense counsel who did not object to the presence of sexual assault victim in the courtroom while defendant testified could not legitimately present for review the claim that trial court erred by permitting her presence. St. v. Lamb, 198 M 323, 646 P2d 516, 39 St. Rep. 1021 (1982).

Independent Knowledge of Juror — Failure to Object: The fact that a juror had acted as a special prosecutor in a disbarment action against an attorney under a workers' compensation indictment and had used the defendant's disbarment, which dealt at length with the facts involved in the defendant's criminal case, as a model in drafting his pleadings did not require a reversal of the defendant's conviction when, at the conclusion of the trial, the juror met with the judge and counsel and told them what he knew and the defendant made no objection. The defense failed to meet its responsibility by its failure to properly object and thereby give the trial court an opportunity to remedy any alleged defects. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Specific Objection to Evidence Required in Persistent Felony Offender Hearing: By failing to make a specific objection, the defendant waived his right to assert that the State's certificate of prior conviction without proof that he was the person named in the certificate was not competent evidence. The defendant was informed well in advance of the time he entered his guilty plea that he would be tried as a persistent felony offender. At the hearing to determine whether the defendant was a persistent felony offender, he had an opportunity to object to the State's lack of identification but failed to do so. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Deferred Sentence Conditioned on Repayment of Attorney's Fees — Objection Not Necessary: Lenihan pleaded guilty to a charge of burglary and received a deferred sentence. One of the conditions of his deferred sentence was that he pay the county $250 as reimbursement for his court-appointed attorney. Lenihan did not object to this condition when sentence was imposed but raised the issue on appeal. On appeal [under this section as it read prior to the 1983 amendment], the court said that it may review any sentence in a criminal case if it is alleged that such sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979).

Duty of Court and Defendant: It is up to the Supreme Court to decide whether an error affects the substantial rights of the defendant, and the defendant must demonstrate prejudice from the record. St. v. Bubnash, 142 M 377, 382 P2d 830 (1963); St. v. Straight, 136 M 255, 347 P2d 482 (1959).

Necessity of Transcript of Evidence: In order to give effect to a predecessor section to determine whether the erroneous instructions were merely technical errors or affected the substantial rights of the accused, it was necessary that the Supreme Court have before it a transcript of the evidence. St. v. Hay, 120 M 573, 194 P2d 232 (1948).

Curing Prejudice — Evidence of Similar Offenses: The withdrawal of evidence of similar offenses, on motion or by instruction, is ineffective to cure prejudice unless the Supreme Court on inspection of the record can say that the effect of the evidence was clearly removed; when a general objection was interposed, the failure to move to strike or withdraw it from the jury's consideration is immaterial. St. v. Simanton, 100 M 292, 49 P2d 981 (1935), overruled on related issue in St. v. Knox, 119 M 449, 175 P2d 774 (1946).

No Prejudice:

In criminal cases no judgment will be reversed for technical errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the defendant, and when the record is sufficient to establish the guilt of the defendant, a new trial will not be granted, even though there was error, unless it clearly appears that the error complained of actually prejudiced the defendant in his right to a fair trial. St. v. Ray, 88 M 436, 294 P 368 (1930); St. v. Dixon, 80 M 181, 260 P 138 (1927).

A judgment of conviction will not be reversed unless the error prejudiced or tended to the prejudice of the defendant. St. v. Vanella, 40 M 326, 106 P 364 (1910); St. v. Rhys, 40 M 131, 105 P 494 (1909).

FAILURE OF PROOF ON APPEAL

Prosecutor's Statements During Closing Argument — Plain Error Review Declined: During closing arguments the prosecutor made remarks regarding three defense witnesses, including statements that the witnesses were liars from a different social stratum, that they were unemployed and collecting unemployment or workers' compensation, and that they played video games all day. On appeal, the defendant claimed reversible error based on prosecutorial misconduct, despite his failure to object in District Court. The Supreme Court reviewed the trial transcripts and considered the comments in the context of the entire argument and held that a failure to review the defendant's claims for plain error review would not result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the fundamental fairness of his trial, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. St. v. Aker, 2013 MT 253, 371 Mont. 491, 310 P.3d 506. See also St. v. Lindberg, 2008 MT 389, 347 Mont. 76, 196 P.3d 1252, St. v. Hayden, 2008 MT 274, 345 Mont. 252, 190 P.3d 1091, and St. v. Mercier, 2021 MT 12, 403 Mont. 34, 479 P.3d 967.

Claim of Prosecutorial Misconduct Unsupported by Fact, Law, or Showing of Prejudice Properly Dismissed: The District Court denied Passmore's motion for dismissal based on prosecutorial misconduct, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Passmore's claim of the prosecutor's conflict of interest lacked factual support, inasmuch as the District Court examined the claim and found no conflict of interest. The claim also lacked legal support because Passmore cited no cases or professional standards that defined "conflict of interest" as Passmore did in the claim or that prohibited the prosecutor from filing charges under the circumstances. Last, Passmore failed to demonstrate prejudice, because even if the prosecutor did have a conflict of interest when requesting leave to file an information against Passmore, Passmore was not tried under that information but rather under an amended information filed by the Attorney General's office 14 months later with permission of the District Court. St. v. Passmore, 2010 MT 34, 355 Mont. 187, 225 P.3d 1229.

Prosecutor's Comments on Credibility of Witnesses and Defendant's Failure to Present Evidence — Plain Error Review Declined: Lindberg claimed reversible error because the prosecutor, in closing arguments during Lindberg's trial on sex crimes, made personal comments regarding the credibility of witnesses and evidence presented by the defense, which Lindberg asserted shifted the burden to Lindberg to prove his innocence and violated the right to a fair trial. Because defense counsel did not object to the comments, Lindberg contended that the rights violation was reviewable under the plain error doctrine. Although not condoning the prosecutor's comments, the Supreme Court nevertheless declined to apply the plain error doctrine because, given the totality of the circumstances, the comments did not rise to a level sufficient to invoke plain error. The comments did not unconstitutionally shift the burden of proof to Lindberg. Failure to review Lindberg's claims would not have resulted in a manifest miscarriage of justice, so plain error review was unwarranted. St. v. Lindberg, 2008 MT 389, 347 M 76, 196 P3d 1252 (2008). See also St. v. Miller, 2022 MT 92, 408 Mont. 316, 510 P.3d 17.

Failure of Defendant to Submit Photographs on Appeal — Review for Prejudice Precluded: Johnson asserted that the trial court erred by allowing the introduction of photographs showing injuries suffered by the victim during an alleged assault because the photographs were per se prejudicial because they were inherently inflammatory and because the existence of injury to the victim was not disputed. The Supreme Court noted that Johnson's failure to submit the photographs as part of the record on appeal inhibited the court's ability to review whether the photographs were prejudicial, and absent any explanation from Johnson of how or why the photographs prejudiced his case, Johnson failed to establish that the District Court abused its discretion in admitting the photographs at trial. St. v. Johnson, 2008 MT 227, 344 M 313, 187 P3d 662 (2008), following St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005).

Improper Admission of Coconspirator's Out-of-Court Statements and Confession — Reversible Error: In a videotaped interview with detectives, Steilman admitted that he and Francis had murdered a man to prove their worth to each other in conducting other criminal activity. Steilman was offered a plea agreement and was called to testify at Francis's trial. When called as a witness, Steilman refused to answer any questions on fifth amendment grounds, so the state sought the admission of the videotaped interview and Steilman's out-of-court statements to lay witnesses. The state contended that the statements to lay witnesses were admissible as statements of a coconspirator made in furtherance of a conspiracy and that the statements to police were admissible as admissions against Steilman's penal interests. The District Court allowed the statements, but not the videotape, although the videotape was subsequently shown to the jury pursuant to a motion by defense counsel, in response to the ruling on the admissibility of the out-of-court statements, in order to give the jury an opportunity to observe Steilman. Francis was ultimately convicted of deliberate homicide and appealed on grounds that admission of the out-of-court statements was reversible error. The state conceded on appeal that the statements to lay witnesses were inadmissible because statements made after attainment of the conspirator's object are not admissible unless the movant can prove that an express agreement existed among the coconspirators to continue to act in concert to cover up the crime after its commission, and the state offered no such proof. Moreover, the statements were not admissible as testimony regarding out-of-court statements made by Francis, or admissible as statements made by Steilman and adopted by Francis. The state also conceded on appeal that the statements made to police were not admissible as statements against Steilman's penal interests. Pursuant to St. v. Castle, 285 M 363, 948 P2d 688 (1997), the fact that portions of a declarant's confession are admissible because they are self-inculpatory does not necessarily make the collateral noninculpatory statements either credible or admissible, particularly when the declarant implicates another person, as in this case when Steilman's confession consisted mainly of blaming Francis. The Supreme Court then applied this section, in light of St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine whether admission of the out-of-court statements constituted structural error or trial error and whether the error was reversible. The error here was trial error. In order to be considered harmless, it was necessary that the state demonstrate that there was no reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence contributed to the verdict. The court agreed that there was sufficient cumulative admissible evidence regarding Francis's purposeful participation in the killing. However, the court was forced to conclude that there was also a reasonable possibility that the erroneously admitted testimony of Steilman's out-of-court statements implicating Francis might have contributed to the conviction, so the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Francis, 2001 MT 233, 307 M 12, 36 P3d 390 (2001).

District Court Exceeding Scope of Appellate Review — Abuse of Discretion in Applying Particularized Suspicion of DUI to Traffic Stop Triggered by Report of Vandalism: Robertson was stopped after a vehicle of the description that he was driving was reported leaving the scene of a vandalism. He was subsequently convicted of DUI in City Court and appealed to District Court on grounds that his right to confront witnesses was denied and that the city had not sustained the necessary burden of proof to support the conviction. The District Court remanded to the City Court for dismissal on grounds that the arresting officer did not have a sufficient particularized suspicion to justify the investigative stop for DUI. However, the issue of a sufficient particularized suspicion was never raised or ruled on in City Court by either Robertson or the city. When a District Court exercises its power of appellate review, it must refrain from deciding issues not properly raised or objected to in the court below; thus, the District Court abused its discretion by exceeding the scope of its appellate review in addressing the issue of particularized suspicion, so the Supreme Court reversed the order of the District Court dismissing the City Court judgment against Robertson. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000). See also Missoula v. Asbury, 265 M 14, 873 P2d 936, 51 St. Rep. 383 (1994), and St. v. Herrera, 1998 MT 173, 289 M 499, 962 P2d 1180 (1998).

Prosecutor's Comments in Response to Defense Counsel's Opening Statement Not Prejudicial: Defense counsel told the jury in opening statements that a witness had made inconsistent statements, referring to a statement given to the investigator for the public defender's office. The investigator was never called, and the theory was not substantiated. The prosecutor referred to the theory in closing, noting that the defense had failed to present the evidence that defense counsel had referred to in opening. Although it is improper to comment on a criminal defendant's failure to testify, it is proper for a prosecutor to direct the jury's attention to facts in issue that could be controverted by persons other than the defendant. The prosecutor was entitled to comment on the theory suggested by defense counsel because the theory lacked evidentiary support. The District Court did not err in refusing to grant a mistrial on grounds of prosecutorial comments because the comments were plainly in response to defense counsel's opening statements. St. v. Soraich, 1999 MT 87, 294 M 173, 979 P2d 206, 56 St. Rep. 370 (1999).

Mere Allegations of Prejudice Insufficient to Satisfy Cumulative Error Doctrine: Defendant contended that the overall demeanor of the prosecution and the District Court, together with other alleged errors, required a reversal of his conviction; however, he articulated no particular comments or remarks and alleged no prejudice to his substantial rights. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the cumulative error doctrine, which is the accumulation of errors which prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial, but noted that mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice are insufficient to satisfy the doctrine. The resolution of the alleged errors indicated no error meriting reversal of this case, and the court held that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing prejudice and declined to reverse his conviction on grounds of cumulative error. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005), St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005), St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007), and St. v. Hatfield, 2018 MT 229, 392 Mont. 509, 426 P.3d 569.

Assignment of Error in Denying New Trial — No Record, Not Argued: When an alleged error in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial was not argued and nothing appeared in the record to sustain it, the assignment did not merit consideration. St. v. Wong Sun, 114 M 185, 133 P2d 761 (1943).

Verdict Contrary to Law or Evidence: An alleged error in an instruction will not be reviewed on appeal when the only ground designated is that the verdict is contrary to the law and evidence. St. v. Gawith, 19 M 48, 47 P 207 (1896), overruled in St. v. Mason, 24 M 340, 61 P 861 (1900).

SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE

Defendant's Convictions Upheld — Potentially Tainted Police Interview Not Contributing to Convictions: The defendant was questioned by police after he was arrested and charged with deliberate homicide for the death of his ex-wife and tampering with evidence. During the questioning, the defendant was advised of his Miranda rights, he declined to waive his rights, and at times he indicated that he did not need an attorney, while at other times he indicated that he had an attorney. The defendant also said he would not answer questions, but he continued to do so and never told the police to stop. At trial, the defendant filed a motion to suppress, arguing that the interview violated his right to counsel. The District Court denied the motion, and after deliberations the jury convicted the defendant of both charges. On appeal, the defendant argued that his convictions must be reversed based upon the denial of his motion to suppress. The Supreme Court evaluated if the ruling on the motion was prejudicial under 46-20-701. Additionally, the court evaluated whether the state could demonstrate that there was no reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction and whether under the cumulative evidence test, evidence existed that provided the same facts as the tainted evidence. Based on all the other evidence in the case, the court held that there was no reasonable possibility that the admission of the interview contributed to the convictions, and the convictions were affirmed. St. v. Larson, 2015 MT 271, 381 Mont. 94, 356 P.3d 488.

Defendant's Probationary Status Considered Inadmissible Trial Evidence of Prior Crimes — New Trial Warranted: At Derbyshire's trial on drug charges, defense counsel moved to exclude any references to the fact that Derbyshire was on probation or that the drug search was conducted by probation officers. The trial court denied the motion and allowed references to probation but gave cautionary instructions prohibiting the jury from using the information to assume that Derbyshire was more likely to be guilty of the offense. Derbyshire was convicted and appealed on grounds that probation references should have been disallowed because they constituted inadmissible evidence of prior crimes. The state did not comply with the requirement of Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., inasmuch as Derbyshire was never notified that evidence of other crimes would be introduced. However, the state asserted that the evidence was admissible under the transaction rule in 26-1-103 and therefore not subject to the procedural requirements of Rule 404(b). The District Court agreed with the state's theory and reasoned that the involvement of probation officers was part of the whole transaction and that the officers' status as probation officers was relevant to why they had certain knowledge and why they acted the way they did. Derbyshire contended that specific roles and titles of the officers who gathered the evidence were immaterial to the ultimate issue of whether Derbyshire possessed a dangerous drug with intent to distribute. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant may not be convicted based on the inference that because he committed crimes in the past he was more likely to have committed the crime charged, and that evidence of Derbyshire's status as a probationer constituted evidence that Derbyshire committed other crimes and thus was generally inadmissible unless an exception such as the transaction rule applied. However, in this case the transaction rule was inapplicable. The officers' status as probation officers and Derbyshire's status as probationer were neither part of nor evidence of the disputed issue of whether Derbyshire possessed a dangerous drug, nor were they "evidence of what transgressed immediately prior and subsequent to the commission of the offense charged" or inextricably linked to and explanatory of the charged offense. Therefore, the District Court erred in denying Derbyshire's motion to exclude evidence of his status as a probationer. Further, the error was considered trial error rather than structural error, and although not presumptively prejudicial, the error was subject to harmless error review. In this case, there was a reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to Derbyshire's conviction, and the state failed to show that, qualitatively, there was no possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to Derbyshire's conviction. Absent a showing that the error was harmless, the conviction was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. St. v. Derbyshire, 2009 MT 27, 349 M 114, 201 P3d 811 (2009), applying the prejudicial error analysis from St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), distinguished in St. v. Michelotti, 2018 MT 158, 392 Mont. 33, 420 P.3d 1020.

Failure to Argue Prejudicial Effect of Malfunctioning Breathalyzer Printer — No Error in Denial of Motion to Suppress: When Otto was tested with a Breathalyzer, the machine registered a 0.159 blood alcohol content but failed to print a card with the test results. Otto moved for dismissal of the Breathalyzer results because a complete test, including the printed results, was not accomplished. The dismissal motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Otto failed to argue prejudice based on the admission of the test results. Given ample additional evidence of Otto's intoxicated condition, failure to suppress the Breathalyzer results did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Otto, 2004 MT 338, 324 M 217, 102 P3d 522 (2004).

Defendant Present in Apartment Where Methamphetamine Lab Found — Totality of Circumstances Justifying Warrantless Arrest: Officers raided Savage's apartment, identified by an anonymous tip as a suspected methamphetamine laboratory. Nalder was also present, and although officers had no previous suspicions regarding Nalder, they arrested her after hearing a toilet running and observing her standing in the kitchen, which was adjacent to the bathroom, near what appeared to be a jar filled with a substance in the first stage of the methamphetamine-producing process. During an interview, Nalder admitted to flushing substances used to make methamphetamine down the toilet when she heard the officers announce themselves. Nalder was charged with tampering with physical evidence, but Nalder moved to suppress the statements and the charge on grounds that probable cause did not exist for her warrantless arrest. The motion was denied, and Nalder was convicted and appealed, contending error in denial of the motion to suppress based on certain findings that were allegedly incorrect. The Supreme Court affirmed. The trial court's finding that the officers announced their presence twice before entering the apartment, contrary to Nalder's claim that she did not hear any knocking, was supported by the evidence and not clearly erroneous because failure to hear did not constitute evidence contradicting the officers' testimony that they announced themselves. The trial court's finding that the officers broke down the door was not supported by substantial evidence and was thus erroneous, but the error was not prejudicial in light of the totality of the circumstances. Nalder correctly asserted that her mere presence at the scene did not justify arrest and that there must be some connection with criminal activity before her warrantless arrest was justified. However, considered in light of the totality of the circumstances and the trained officers' knowledge, there was sufficient probable cause for Nalder's arrest. The officers received extensive training in what to reasonably expect while raiding a methamphetamine laboratory, and evaluated in accordance with the officers' perceptions, they could reasonably believe that Nalder was committing, and had just committed, a crime. St. v. Nalder, 2001 MT 270, 307 M 280, 37 P3d 661 (2001).

Improper Admission of Coconspirator's Out-of-Court Statements and Confession — Reversible Error: In a videotaped interview with detectives, Steilman admitted that he and Francis had murdered a man to prove their worth to each other in conducting other criminal activity. Steilman was offered a plea agreement and was called to testify at Francis's trial. When called as a witness, Steilman refused to answer any questions on fifth amendment grounds, so the state sought the admission of the videotaped interview and Steilman's out-of-court statements to lay witnesses. The state contended that the statements to lay witnesses were admissible as statements of a coconspirator made in furtherance of a conspiracy and that the statements to police were admissible as admissions against Steilman's penal interests. The District Court allowed the statements, but not the videotape, although the videotape was subsequently shown to the jury pursuant to a motion by defense counsel, in response to the ruling on the admissibility of the out-of-court statements, in order to give the jury an opportunity to observe Steilman. Francis was ultimately convicted of deliberate homicide and appealed on grounds that admission of the out-of-court statements was reversible error. The state conceded on appeal that the statements to lay witnesses were inadmissible because statements made after attainment of the conspirator's object are not admissible unless the movant can prove that an express agreement existed among the coconspirators to continue to act in concert to cover up the crime after its commission, and the state offered no such proof. Moreover, the statements were not admissible as testimony regarding out-of-court statements made by Francis, or admissible as statements made by Steilman and adopted by Francis. The state also conceded on appeal that the statements made to police were not admissible as statements against Steilman's penal interests. Pursuant to St. v. Castle, 285 M 363, 948 P2d 688 (1997), the fact that portions of a declarant's confession are admissible because they are self-inculpatory does not necessarily make the collateral noninculpatory statements either credible or admissible, particularly when the declarant implicates another person, as in this case when Steilman's confession consisted mainly of blaming Francis. The Supreme Court then applied this section, in light of St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine whether admission of the out-of-court statements constituted structural error or trial error and whether the error was reversible. The error here was trial error. In order to be considered harmless, it was necessary that the state demonstrate that there was no reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence contributed to the verdict. The court agreed that there was sufficient cumulative admissible evidence regarding Francis's purposeful participation in the killing. However, the court was forced to conclude that there was also a reasonable possibility that the erroneously admitted testimony of Steilman's out-of-court statements implicating Francis might have contributed to the conviction, so the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Francis, 2001 MT 233, 307 M 12, 36 P3d 390 (2001).

No Abuse of Discretion in Failure to Dismiss Case on Court's Own Motion for Insufficient Evidence: Brady was charged with DUI, fourth or subsequent offense, arising from circumstances surrounding a single-vehicle accident in which Brady swerved off the highway, hit a rock wall, and rolled the vehicle. After the state's case in chief, Brady moved for a directed verdict of acquittal, but the motion was denied. Brady was subsequently convicted and contended on appeal that the trial court erred when it did not dismiss the case on its own motion because the evidence was far from overwhelming, arguing that taken as a whole, the evidence was insufficient to submit to the jury because there was no direct or even circumstantial evidence that he had anything to drink, much less was intoxicated, at the time of the accident. However, there was circumstantial evidence of conduct before and after the accident that could have led the jury to believe Brady had been drinking. When circumstantial evidence is susceptible to differing interpretations, it is within the province of the jury to decide which will prevail. The jury apparently did not believe that the wreck happened because Brady's car malfunctioned, that his injuries accounted for his drunken behavior, or that his apparent intoxication when officers tracked him down at home after the accident was the consequence of a single beer that he drank after the accident. Taken in a light most favorable to the state, a reasonable juror could have found Brady guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and it was not error for the trial court to allow the evidence to go to the jury. St. v. Brady, 2000 MT 282, 302 M 174, 13 P3d 941, 57 St. Rep. 1178 (2000).

Victim's Unsupported and Self-Contradicted Word Against Defendant's — Sufficiency of Evidence: An aggravated kidnapping and assault prosecution essentially consisted of defendant's word against victim's. Defendant's claim on appeal that the evidence was insufficient to support the convictions because victim's testimony was not corroborated by other testimony or by physical evidence and was contradicted by her statements to police after the events in question was rejected on appeal. The trial judge believed victim to be more credible than defendant; prior inconsistent statements do not necessarily render testimony inherently noncredible; and the trial took place almost 4 years after the offenses, and the victim said that she had trouble remembering everything. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Allegation That Evidence Is Circumstantial and Susceptible of Different Interpretations: Allegation that evidence of guilt was circumstantial and susceptible of different interpretations relates to the weight of the evidence, not its sufficiency, and was properly refused as a basis for granting a motion of acquittal. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Test:

When sufficiency of the evidence or elements of the offense issues are presented on appeal, the standard of review applied by the Supreme Court will be whether, after review of the evidence in a light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106, 49 St. Rep. 586 (1992), overruling the portion of St. v. Cope, 250 M 387, 819 P2d 1280 (1991), that holds that a "clearly erroneous" standard is to be applied to judge-made findings of fact on the substantive elements of a criminal offense, but leaving intact the Cope standard for review of findings of fact on other issues in criminal proceedings, distinguishing Interstate Prod. Credit Ass'n v. DeSaye, 250 M 320, 820 P2d 1285 (1991), and followed, with regard to findings of fact regarding suppression hearing evidence, in St. v. Kaluza, 262 M 360, 865 P2d 263, 50 St. Rep. 1596 (1993). See also St. v. Riley, 252 M 469, 830 P2d 549, 49 St. Rep. 408 (1992), and St. v. Carter, 285 M 449, 948 P2d 1173, 54 St. Rep. 1235 (1997).

The applicable rule on review of the sufficiency of the evidence to support a criminal conviction is whether there is substantial evidence to support the conviction, viewed in a light most favorable to the state. Substantial evidence is such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conclusion. St. v. Plouffe, 198 M 379, 646 P2d 533, 39 St. Rep. 1064 (1982), followed in St. v. Lapp, 202 M 327, 658 P2d 400, 40 St. Rep. 120 (1983). For application to civil proceedings, see Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665, 43 St. Rep. 825 (1986).

The "clearly erroneous" test does not apply to review sufficiency of the evidence to support a jury verdict in a criminal case, and a conviction must be affirmed if reasonable and prudent persons could have concluded that taken in the light most favorable to the government the evidence warranted a finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. U.S. v. Kipp, 624 F2d 84 (9th Cir. 1980).

Sufficiency of Evidence When Self-Defense Claimed: On appeal, defendant convicted of aggravated assault argued that she met her burden of proof of self-defense, which she correctly stated as raising a reasonable doubt as to her guilt. The Supreme Court's function on appeal is not to determine whether she raised a reasonable doubt as to her guilt but whether the evidence was sufficient to support her conviction when viewed in the light most favorable to the state (see St. v. Lamb, 198 M 323, 646 P2d 516, 39 St. Rep. 1021 (1982)). Disputed questions of fact and the credibility of witnesses will not be considered on appeal (see St. v. DeGeorge, 173 M 35, 566 P2d 59 (1977)). Finding substantial evidence in the record, the court held that defendant was not justified in using force likely to cause death or serious bodily harm. St. v. Tonkovich, 221 M 8, 716 P2d 615, 43 St. Rep. 592 (1986).

Victim's Contradictory Statements — Sufficiency of Evidence: There was sufficient evidence to support the conviction of defendant for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) despite the victim's contradiction of her prior statements about the assault when the victim and her child arrived at the battered women's shelter with swollen lips and mouths and when the victim stated at the shelter and immediately thereafter that she and her daughter had been violently beaten by the defendant. St. v. Oman, 218 M 260, 707 P2d 1117, 42 St. Rep. 1565 (1985). See also St. v. Brown, 239 M 453, 781 P2d 281, 46 St. Rep. 1825 (1989).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Arson: Sufficient evidence supported appellant's arson conviction when evidence presented at trial indicated that appellant: (1) had been angered by his son's conveyance of the cabin; (2) had twice threatened to burn down the cabin; (3) had been seen driving from the direction of the cabin by a deputy sheriff soon after the fire was reported; (4) when followed by the deputy sheriff, drove in excess of 85 miles an hour until the deputy was able to stop him; and (5) had tires on his vehicle that matched tire tracks left at the cabin. St. v. Berklund, 217 M 218, 704 P2d 59, 42 St. Rep. 1147 (1985).

Inconsistent Statements of Victims — Sufficiency of Evidence: Inconsistencies in the testimony of the complaining witnesses did not make the evidence insufficient to support a conviction or show that it inherently lacked credibility. St. v. Anderson, 211 M 272, 686 P2d 193, 41 St. Rep. 1357 (1984).

Test for Sufficiency of Evidence — Proof of Felonious Intent: In an appeal from a conviction for criminal mischief and attempted burglary, the defendant argued that it was mere happenstance that he was found hiding in a packing crate with burglary tools near the scene of an attempted burglary, that there was no direct proof of his participation in the attempted burglary or of his felonious intent, and that the record therefore did not support his conviction. The Supreme Court followed the test for sufficiency of the evidence reviewed in St. v. Graham, 206 M 49, 669 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 1499 (1983), and the rationale of St. v. Pasco, 173 M 121, 566 P2d 802 (1977) (holding that circumstantial evidence may be used to prove criminal intent), and found that there was substantial evidence to uphold the conviction. St. v. Gladue, 209 M 235, 679 P2d 1256, 41 St. Rep. 669 (1984).

Sentence — Improper Vindictiveness Claim on Appeal: Defendant was convicted of negligent arson and given the maximum sentence. On appeal, counsel argued that since defendant was a 38-year-old man employed as a teacher, was a captain in the army reserve, and had no criminal record, the maximum sentence indicated judicial vindictiveness. In the absence of any evidence indicating vindictiveness on the part of the judge, it was improper to suggest its presence and the issue was summarily dismissed. St. v. Gray, 202 M 445, 659 P2d 255, 40 St. Rep. 199 (1983).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Negligent Homicide by Means of Vehicle — Identity of Driver: Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide after a vehicle owned by defendant and his wife struck and killed a pedestrian. Defendant's wife first admitted having been the driver of the vehicle at the time of the accident but later withdrew her statement. Subsequently her husband was arrested, tried, and convicted of the crime. In reviewing the conviction on the issue of sufficiency of the evidence, the Supreme Court ruled the evidence sufficient and based its ruling on the following factors: (1) defendant's wife testified that he was the driver; (2) a witness saw defendant driving shortly before the accident; (3) witnesses testified that it appeared that the driver was a male and that the passenger had long hair; and (4) medical evidence on the location of the injuries defendant sustained in the accident indicated that defendant was the driver. St. v. Henricks, 201 M 157, 653 P2d 479, 39 St. Rep. 2022 (1982).

Lack of Record — Unlawfully Sequestered Witness: Supreme Court would not consider claim that prosecution unlawfully sequestered a subpoenaed witness who may have provided exculpatory testimony for defense where there was nothing on the record to which court could look. St. v. Lamb, 198 M 323, 646 P2d 516, 39 St. Rep. 1021 (1982).

Circumstantial Evidence — Review Standard:

A review of the evidence following conviction in a criminal trial, whether the evidence is wholly direct, wholly circumstantial, or a combination of the two, must begin with the principles: (1) that the correct test is whether there is substantial evidence supporting the conviction, viewed in the light most favorable to the state; and (2) that "substantial evidence" is such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conviction. A conviction based upon circumstantial evidence may require a greater degree of scrutiny but does not require a separate or unique evidentiary test on review. St. v. Johnson, 197 M 122, 641 P2d 462, 39 St. Rep. 419 (1982), followed in St. v. Green, 212 M 20, 685 P2d 370, 41 St. Rep. 1562 (1984), and St. v. Lias, 218 M 124, 706 P2d 500, 42 St. Rep. 1453 (1985).

Appellant alleged that to justify a conviction on circumstantial evidence, the facts and circumstances must not only be entirely consistent with the theory of guilt but must also be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion. The allegation did not set forth the full standard for review of a verdict based primarily upon circumstantial evidence; the court should inquire whether the facts and circumstances are of such a quality and quantity as to legally justify a jury in determining guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and if such be the case, the court cannot set aside the conviction. St. v. Johnson, 197 M 122, 641 P2d 462, 39 St. Rep. 419 (1982).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Assault With Dangerous Weapon: Evidence was not insufficient to convict for assault with a dangerous weapon where appellant had an altercation in the dark, and there was testimony that he struck victim, had a knife in hand shortly before he struck, and victim suffered a knife cut. U.S. v. Kipp, 624 F.2d 84 (9th Cir. 1980).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Theft: In a theft proceeding, if the evidence shows that defendant was in possession of recently stolen property, either singly or jointly with others, an inference of guilt is warranted. Evidence of possession by the defendant is not rebutted merely by showing another's presence. Where this evidence is presented, there is sufficient evidence to send the case to the jury and the trial court may properly reject a motion to dismiss for failure to establish a prima facie case and the verdict, supported by substantial evidence, will be upheld on appeal. St. v. White, 185 M 213, 605 P.2d 191 (1980).

SUBSTANTIAL RIGHTS AFFECTED

Failure to Make Record of Critical Stages of Trial — No Error: The District Court in a homicide case failed to make a record of various conferences that occurred during the trial. After the defendant was convicted, he appealed, arguing that the failure to preserve the record violated his substantive due process rights and that excluding the public from the conferences violated his right to a public trial. The Supreme Court declined to extend the holding in St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 Mont. 428, 41 P.3d 305, and found that because the District Court advised the parties that conferences would be unrecorded and placed the burden on the parties to make their own records, there was no error. The Supreme Court further found that while the defendant had not waived his right to a public trial, he did not meet his burden to show that the private conferences compromised the fairness of the trial. St. v. Hatfield, 2018 MT 229, 392 Mont. 509, 426 P.3d 569.

Right of Presence Violated — No Error When No Prejudice: A defendant was excluded from various conferences throughout the trial and convicted of deliberate homicide. On appeal, he alleged that his right of presence was violated, constituting structural error and rendering his trial fundamentally unfair. The Supreme Court agreed that his right of presence was violated at critical stages of the proceedings, thus implicating his fundamental rights, but found that no error occurred as a result because there was no evidence of a manifest miscarriage of justice or compromised integrity of the judicial process. St. v. Hatfield, 2018 MT 229, 392 Mont. 509, 426 P.3d 569. See also St. v. George, 2020 MT 56, 399 Mont. 173, 459 P.3d 854.

Evidence of Plea Agreement for Previous Incident Excluded — Defendant Unable to Impeach Witness With Motive to Testify Falsely — Mistrial Declared: Prior to trial, a defendant driver filed notice of his intent to use a passenger's plea agreement and prior drug charges to prove the contraband at issue belonged to the passenger and not the driver. The passenger had faced a potential 147-year sentence for a previous incident combined with the incident at issue and had received an agreement from the state for 7 years with 2 years suspended. The sentencing judge was not bound by the agreement, and the passenger had not been sentenced at the time of the defendant driver's trial. During the trial, the District Court erred by excluding evidence of the plea agreement and curtailing cross-examination of the passenger after the passenger stated she had not received a favorable deal because the plea agreement was offered not to show the passenger's criminal disposition but rather to impeach the passenger's credibility and show her motive for testifying against the driver. Because the error was prejudicial, the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Flowers, 2018 MT 96, 391 Mont. 237, 416 P.3d 180.

Defendant Absent From Deposition of State Witness — Right to Presence Raised for First Time on Appeal — Procedural Requirement for Preserving Right Clarified: The defendant's counsel, but not the defendant, attended the deposition of a witness for the state. Portions of the deposition were later introduced at trial. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed and argued that his absence from the deposition violated his right to be present at all critical stages of his trial. The state argued that the defendant could not raise the issue for the first time on appeal. The Supreme Court clarified the procedural requirement for preserving a right to presence claim for appellate review, holding that a right to presence claim not presented to the trial court is not considered unless plain error review is warranted or ineffective assistance of counsel is claimed. In this case, the Supreme Court concluded that the defendant's argument was not sufficient to warrant plain error review and declined to consider it. St. v. Reim, 2014 MT 108, 374 Mont. 487, 323 P.3d 880. See also St. v. Hatfield, 2018 MT 229, 392 Mont. 509, 426 P.3d 569.

Evidence of Prior Rape Conviction Introduced at Trial — Violation of Right to Fair Trial: During his trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent, the defendant gave notice that he intended to establish that the victim, with whom he had been in a long-term relationship, had a violent character. The defendant was advised that were he to discuss her character, his own full criminal history could be discussed at trial. During the trial, the prosecutor mentioned the defendant's prior rape conviction. After his conviction, the defendant appealed, arguing that the discussion of his prior rape conviction violated his right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court agreed, noting that there was a reasonable possibility that the evidence of his prior rape conviction had influenced the defendant's conviction, and remanded the matter for a new trial. St. v. Rogers, 2013 MT 221, 371 Mont. 239, 306 P.3d 348.

Improper Admission of Hearsay Evidence Not Reversible Error: A law enforcement officer testified to a conversation with a Connecticut official who stated that the defendant was not in compliance with that state's sexual offender registration laws. The Supreme Court held that the testimony was hearsay but its admission was not reversible error because the testimony did not go to proving an element of the crime the defendant was charged with, namely failing to register in Montana as a sex offender. St. v. Payne, 2011 MT 35, 359 Mont. 270, 248 P.3d 842.

Felony Convictions for Unlawful Possession of Game Animals Affirmed — Jury Instructions Proper: The jury found that Norman illegally possessed two buck mule deer, one antelope, and one bull elk in 2007, one cow elk and one buck mule deer in November 2004, and one antelope and one bull elk in 2003, in violation of either 87-1-111 or 87-1-115 (now repealed, but see 87-6-906 and 87-6-907). Under each count, the jury found that the value of the animals either individually or in the aggregate exceeded $1,000. Norman argued on appeal that the District Court improperly instructed the jury by not specifically instructing on the element of value. Norman also argued that, pursuant to the first count, the animals were not part of the "same transaction" under 87-3-111 (now repealed) because they were killed on different dates. Norman also objected to a special instruction that indicated that the jury needed to find Norman guilty of only one offense under each count. The Supreme Court affirmed. The court was not "firmly convinced" that its failure to review the instructions would result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial or proceedings, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. In addition, the prosecutor's grouping of the animals as part of the "same transaction," which allowed the value of the animals to be aggregated, was not improper, and Norman did not object at trial to the special instruction provided to the jury. St. v. Norman, 2010 MT 253, 358 Mont. 252, 244 P.3d 737.

Attorney's Failure to Object to Multiple Charges — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Goodenough alleged that he received ineffective assistance of counsel on the basis that his counsel should have objected under 46-11-410 to his conviction or sentence for both sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault. Goodenough did not object at the District Court level and is not entitled to raise the issue on appeal. In addition, Goodenough did not receive ineffective assistance of counsel because the facts and evidence supported separate charges that did not constitute a single transaction. St. v. Goodenough, 2010 MT 247, 358 Mont. 219, 245 P.3d 14, distinguishing St. v. Williams, 2010 MT 58, 355 Mont. 354, 228 P.3d 1127.

Defendant's Right to Be Present at In-Chambers Conference on Evidentiary Issues — Reversal Granted Absent Waiver of Right: At the close of the state's case in chief during Matt's deliberate homicide trial, the trial judge, prosecutor, and defense counsel met in the judge's chambers to discuss evidentiary matters and Matt's motion to dismiss for lack of evidence. Matt was not present during the conference, and defense counsel stated that Matt's presence was unnecessary because the issues were legal and Matt "doesn't get any of this anyway". Following conviction, Matt appealed on grounds that he had the right to be present at the conference because it was a critical stage of the trial. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The in-chambers conference was a critical stage of the trial, so Matt's right to be present applied. Defense counsel's statement that Matt did not need to be present was not a valid waiver of Matt's right to be present because there was no on-the-record personal waiver, so Matt did not knowingly and intelligently waive the right. Once it was established that Matt's fundamental right to be present was violated, prejudice was presumed. Although not all constitutional violations amount to reversible error, if the violation contaminates the framework within which the trial proceeds or if the constitutional right is so basic that its infraction cannot be treated as harmless, the violation is considered a structural error and reversal is automatic. If the violation does not fall within this category, the question is whether the violation was harmless, and the burden is on the state to demonstrate that there is no possibility that violation of the right to be present prejudiced the defendant. In this case, nothing discussed at the conference and ruled on by the District Court concerned or affected the framework within which Matt's trial proceeded or necessarily rendered the trial unfair, so the violation was not considered structural and subject to automatic reversal. Thus, the burden fell to the state to show that the violation was harmless and not prejudicial. The state did not provide a harmless error analysis on appeal and therefore did not meet its burden. The case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Matt, 2008 MT 444, 347 M 530, 199 P3d 244 (2008), following Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18 (1967), Ranta v. St., 1998 MT 95, 288 M 391, 958 P2d 670 (1998), St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 M 428, 41 P3d 305 (2001), St. v. Bird, 2002 MT 2, 308 M 75, 43 P3d 266 (2002), and St. v. McCarthy, 2004 MT 312, 324 M 1, 101 P3d 288 (2004), and followed in St. v. Godfrey, 2009 MT 60, 349 M 335, 203 P3d 834 (2009), regarding determination of trial error rather than structural error.

Exclusion of Defendant From Pretrial Meeting to Determine Whether Defendant Be Allowed to Proceed Pro Se Violative of Right to Be Present and Defend Oneself — Reversible Error: An alleged violation of the constitutional right to be present and appear at all criminal proceedings does not warrant automatic reversal. Rather, the Supreme Court considers the effect that a violation has on a defendant to determine whether a defendant has suffered any conceivable prejudice. In this case, Mann was excluded from a pretrial meeting to determine whether Mann would be represented by counsel or proceed pro se at trial on burglary and misdemeanor assault charges. This important determination implicated a substantial issue in the scope of the criminal proceedings, and excluding Mann from the meeting, at which Mann's counsel portrayed Mann in a negative light, violated Mann's right to be present and defend himself and right to effective assistance of counsel. Violation of these fundamental constitutional rights was sufficiently prejudicial to constitute reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Mann, 2006 MT 160, 332 M 476, 139 P3d 159 (2006).

Tainted Character Evidence Considered Prejudicial — New Trial Warranted: During Nolan's trial for resisting arrest, criminal endangerment, and bail-jumping, Nolan was asked why he did not appear on the original trial date and jumped bail instead. Nolan stated that he was taking pain medication for a bad tooth and overslept, and had just started a new job and did not want to miss work because he needed the money to pay the bills and feed his children, whom he loved. Over objection, the prosecutor pursued an extended series of questions regarding Nolan's job history and personal relationships, which revealed that Nolan had fathered a number of children by several women, none of whom he had married, and that he did not pay child support because none had been ordered. Other testimony related to Nolan's character, including rebuttal testimony from one woman that Nolan acted as pimp for her prostitution activities. The state contended that Nolan opened the door to the questioning by asserting that he was a decent man and member of the community who cared about his family. Nolan contended that the cross-examination and rebuttal evidence forced him to defend his lifestyle choices and impermissibly turned a bail-jumping trial into a trial of his morals. The Supreme Court agreed with Nolan. The state's right to a full cross-examination of a defendant's character traits, once placed at issue, is not limitless. Here, the prosecutor went beyond permissible cross-examination and rebuttal and ended up trying Nolan's character. Because trial error is not presumptively prejudicial, the Supreme Court reviewed the error under this section to determine whether the error prejudiced Nolan's case. The court concluded that the evidence was highly inflammatory and presented a significant possibility that the qualitative effect of the cross-examination and rebuttal contributed to Nolan's conviction. Because of the prejudice involved, Nolan's conviction was reversed and the case was remanded for further proceedings related to the charges. St. v. Nolan, 2003 MT 55, 314 M 371, 66 P3d 269 (2003).

Confession a Result of Exploitation of Unlawful Arrest — Miranda Warning Insufficient to Negate Cumulative Effect of Circumstances Leading to Confession: Officers had insufficient probable cause to arrest Van Dort, resulting in an unlawful arrest, and the Supreme Court then considered whether Van Dort's subsequent confession was legitimate. The state maintained that because Van Dort was given Miranda warnings, the confession should be admissible. Van Dort averred that the Miranda warnings alone were insufficient to sever the causal connection between the confession and the arrest. The court noted that as set out in St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94 (1985), which adopted the federal rule set out in Brown v. Ill., 422 US 590 (1975), the general principle is that a confession obtained as a result of an unlawful arrest is inadmissible; however, there must be a causal connection between the arrest and the confession. In determining whether a causal connection exists, the court considers: (1) the presence or absence of timely Miranda warnings; (2) whether there was an intervening independent act by the defendant or some third party; (3) the temporal proximity of the arrest and confession; and (4) the degree of the alleged constitutional violation. Miranda warnings will not, in all cases, attenuate the corruptive effect of a prior constitutional violation or remove the taint of a prior constitutional violation. In this case, the Miranda warnings did not sever the chain of causality between Van Dort's unlawful arrest and the confession and were insufficient to negate the cumulative effect of all the relevant circumstances leading to Van Dort's confession. The court distinguished Beach, holding that despite the issuance of Miranda warnings, Van Dort's confession was the result of the exploitation of the unlawful arrest and inadmissible as fruit of the poisonous tree, and the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's denial of Van Dort's motion to suppress. St. v. Van Dort, 2003 MT 104, 315 M 303, 68 P3d 728 (2003).

Possibility That Statements Made During Custodial Interrogation, After Lawyer Requested, Contributed to Conviction — New Trial Warranted: Spang was charged in connection with a double homicide. He made statements to police after being read his rights at arrest and again 2 days later after requesting a lawyer. Spang moved to suppress the statements, but the motion was denied on grounds that Spang waived the right to counsel after voluntarily answering interrogators' questions on both occasions. Transcripts of the interrogations were made available to the jury, and Spang was subsequently convicted on two counts of intimidation by accountability, but appealed based on insufficiency of evidence. The Supreme Court reviewed the denial of the suppression motion to determine whether the trial court's findings of fact were clearly erroneous and whether they were correctly applied as a matter of law. Here, Spang's request for counsel was neither ambiguous nor equivocal, so cessation of questioning was required until Spang either reinitiated conversation with the officers or was provided an attorney. Because neither event occurred, the trial court erred when it denied Spang's motion to suppress the statements. To determine whether the error was prejudicial, the Supreme Court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), determining in this case that the error was trial error, because it occurred during presentation of the case to the jury and was amenable to qualitative assessment for prejudicial impact relative to other evidence introduced at trial. Under the cumulative evidence test, the state was required to show admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence. Although there was other sufficient evidence tending to prove that Spang committed intimidation by accountability, qualitatively there existed a reasonable possibility that the statements that Spang made during the second interrogation contributed to his conviction because of the strong emphasis placed on those statements during trial. Therefore, the District Court committed reversible error when it admitted the statements during the state's case in chief. The case was remanded for a new trial, and the District Court was directed not to admit the statements made during the second interrogation. Statements from the first interrogation were admissible, however, because Spang had waived the right to counsel. Spang's argument that the first interrogation statements also be suppressed on unnecessary delay grounds failed, absent evidence that the delay between arrest and initial appearance influenced the voluntariness of those statements. St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Brubaker, 184 M 294, 602 P2d 974 (1979), and overruled, to the extent that the right to counsel for self-incrimination purposes may be invoked in custodial interrogation, in St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006).

Failure to Summon Jurors in Statutory Manner — Lamere Per Se Rule Retroactively Applied — Rule of Law Inapplicable Considering Substantial Change in Law: In St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359 (1998), Robbins moved to quash the jury panel because prospective jurors had been summoned by telephone instead of by mail or personal service, as required in 3-15-505. The motion was denied because Robbins failed to introduce any evidence that he was prejudiced, rendering the error harmless. The Supreme Court subsequently decided St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000), holding that improper jury summons constituted denial of the fundamental right to a fair trial and thus was per se prejudicial. Robbins then petitioned for postconviction relief on grounds that Lamere should be retroactively applied. The District Court denied the petition, concluding that under the law of the case doctrine, Lamere was not retroactively applicable. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. The law of the case doctrine provides that when a decision is rendered by the Supreme Court, the decision is binding and cannot be relitigated in the trial court or on a subsequent appeal. However, a court may reconsider the issue in postconviction proceedings when there has been a substantial change in applicable law. Lamere specifically overruled the opinion in Robbins' 1998 direct appeal to the extent that a violation of 3-15-505 could be harmless error, which constituted a substantial change in the law, so the law of the case doctrine did not preclude the application of Lamere to Robbins' 2002 postconviction proceedings. Robbins was entitled to retroactive application of Lamere because the state's action in procuring the jury denied Robbins of a right that goes to the very integrity of the justice system, and is implicit in the concept of ordered liberty for purposes of coming within the exception to the retroactivity analysis in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288 (1989). Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Plenary Review of Criminal Sentence by Supreme Court Even Though No Objection Made at Sentencing: Brister was sentenced to 20 years for felony sexual assault with 10 years suspended, served the 10-year prison sentence, and then was released and began the 10-year suspended sentence. About 6 years into the suspended sentence, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court then revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Brister did not object to any of the conditions when they were imposed, but filed a motion objecting to the sentence 2 months later, claiming that the conditions were not and could not have been included in the original suspended sentence, and thus violated double jeopardy and ex post facto laws. The state maintained that Brister waived any objections to the conditions by failing to contemporaneously object when the sentence was pronounced, and that the appeal from the sentence was not timely filed. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. Further, Brister provided the District Court with an opportunity to correct any sentencing errors by filing an objection under 46-18-117 (now repealed), which allowed 120 days for correction of an illegal sentence, so Brister retained the right to appeal the purportedly illegal sentence. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), overruling St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019 (2000), St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), and St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), to the extent that those cases held that failure to raise a contemporaneous objection to an illegal sentence at the time of hearing resulted in waiver of defendant's objection, and followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). See also St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Prejudicial Error in Failure to Accept Guilty Pleas: Peplow was charged with and convicted of DUI, driving with a suspended or revoked license, driving without insurance, failing to report an accident, and tampering with evidence. Prior to trial, Peplow tried to enter guilty pleas to the driving with a suspended or revoked license and driving without insurance counts, but the trial court ruled that it was not required to accept the pleas. Peplow appealed. The Supreme Court held that the tampering with evidence charge was not applicable and that Peplow had a right to plead guilty and thus the trial court erred in refusing the pleas. The Supreme Court then applied St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine whether denial of the pleas prejudiced Peplow's right to a fair trial. The court first determined that the error did not undermine the fairness of the entire trial proceeding, nor was it of constitutional dimensions, so it was considered a trial error rather than a structural error. Once a convicted person establishes that the evidence in question was erroneously admitted and has alleged prejudice, the state must then demonstrate that the error was not prejudicial, i.e., that the quality of the tainted evidence was such that there was no reasonable possibility that it might have contributed to the conviction. Therefore, pursuant to Van Kirk, the Supreme Court was required to determine whether the evidence proving that Peplow drove with a suspended license and without insurance went to prove an element of either of the substantive charges of DUI or failing to report an accident. The court noted that if Peplow's guilty pleas had been properly accepted, the evidence in question would not have been admissible. Further, the jury was presented with ample admissible evidence that Peplow was under the influence, so it was not necessary that the state object to the guilty pleas in order to buttress the record at trial. However, the qualitative effect of the inadmissible evidence was such that there was a reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to the DUI conviction, so that conviction was reversed and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001).

Pervasive Misconduct of Plaintiffs' Counsel Preventing Fair Trial on Merits: At Josephson's trial for assault, plaintiffs' counsel attempted to put inadmissible matters before the jury by repeatedly asking objectionable questions and raising impermissible inferences. Although the trial court repeatedly admonished plaintiffs' counsel not to bolster with inadmissible evidence, attempt to introduce inadmissible hearsay, and ignore the court's rulings on certain issues, plaintiffs' counsel blithely proceeded to do what he knew he should not. As set out in St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323 (1994), the repeated asking of questions that are clearly intended to keep the assumption of damaging facts that cannot be proved before the jury, in order to impress upon their minds the probability of the existence of the assumed facts upon which the questions are based, constitutes gross misconduct. In this case, despite the trial court's attempts to eliminate the prejudicial impact of the conduct with admonitions and curative instructions, the conduct of plaintiffs' counsel was so pervasive that it prevented Josephson from receiving a fair trial on the merits, raising the presumption of prejudice and warranting reversal of Josephson's conviction and a new trial. Lopez v. Josephson, 2001 MT 133, 305 M 446, 30 P3d 326 (2001). See also Durden v. Hydro Flame Corp., 1998 MT 47, 288 M 1, 955 P2d 160 (1998).

Failure to Summon Entire Panel by Telephonic Juror Summoning — New Trial Warranted: Of the 200-juror panel randomly drawn for Lamere's murder trial, over one-third of the prospective jurors were excluded from possible jury service by virtue of the manner in which a telephone-only notification method skewed the random nature and objectivity of the statutory jury selection procedures. By failing to summon the entire panel or array drawn for the trial, the purpose of juror notification was undermined. Jury duty cannot be lightly shirked, as a telephone summoning system allowed, without doing violence to the democratic nature of the jury system. Because the substantial failure to comply with the statutory requirements materially undermined the jury selection process, Lamere was granted a new trial. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Thiel v. S. Pac. Co., 328 US 217, 90 L Ed 1181, 66 S Ct 984 (1946), and applied retroactively in Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002). See also St. v. Groom, 49 M 354, 141 P 858 (1914), and State ex rel. School District v. Carroll, 87 M 45, 284 P 1008 (1930).

Substantial Compliance Standard Clarified With Regard to Statutory Process for Forming Jury: The objective statutory procedures established by the Legislature for the random selection of jurors are intended to protect a defendant's fundamental right to a fair and impartial jury and must be substantially complied with. Under Montana case law, the substantial compliance standard is not an absolute rule inasmuch as it permits minor deviations from statutory procedure. These technical deviations do not constitute a substantial failure to comply and therefore do not give rise to a presumption of prejudice. In clarifying the substantial compliance standard, the Supreme Court took guidance from federal case law developed under the federal Jury Selection and Service Act of 1968, 28 U.S.C. 1861, et seq. In order to establish a violation under the federal Act, a defendant must show that the government substantially failed to comply with the methods set forth by statute for jury selection. Substantial failure has been construed as a violation that contravenes one of two basic principles: (1) random selection of jurors; and (2) determination of juror disqualification, excuses, exemptions, and exclusion on the basis of objective criteria. A successful challenge to the jury panel may be founded only on a material departure from the law, a deviation amounting to more than a technical irregularity. Thus, a substantial or material statutory departure that affects the random nature or objectivity of the jury selection process establishes a violation independently of the departure's consequences in an individual case, while a technical or nonmaterial violation constitutes nonprejudicial error under the substantial compliance standard. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), overruling St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998).

Telephone Jury-Summoning Procedure Violative of Statutory Selection Process — Showing of Substantial Compliance, Not Prejudice, Required — Reversible Error: Lamere, charged with killing Brownlee, filed a pretrial motion to strike the jury panel, but the motion was denied. The question on appeal was whether the District Court erred in concluding that Lamere failed to show that the telephone-dependent summoning procedure used in Cascade County prejudiced Lamere's substantial rights to a jury drawn and summoned according to law. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), in holding that the method of summoning jurors by telephone failed to comply with statutes governing the impaneling of a jury because jurors were neither served by mail nor served personally by the Sheriff. However, to warrant reversal, Robbins also required a showing of actual prejudice in addition to a substantial failure to comply with statutory law in drawing a jury panel. The Supreme Court chose to return to the per se rule of reversal for failure to substantially comply with statutes governing procurement of a trial jury, overruling the Robbins requirement of prejudice. The decision turned on the U.S. Supreme Court's contemporary distinction between trial error, to which harmless error review applies, and structural error, to which harmless error review is inapplicable (see Johnson v. U.S., 520 US 461, 137 L Ed 2d 718, 117 S Ct 1544 (1997), and its predecessors). In Lamere's case, the automatic rule of reversal prevailed because errors in the jury selection process are structural in nature, affecting the very framework within which a trial proceeds—errors that indelibly affect the essential fairness of the trial itself. A material failure to substantially comply with Montana statutes governing procurement of a trial jury may not be treated as harmless error because: (1) it precedes the presentation of evidence to the jury and cannot be analyzed as a mere trial error without resorting to speculation; (2) it precedes the trial process and cannot be quantitatively assessed for its prejudicial impact relative to the evidence introduced at trial; (3) it affects the very framework within which the trial proceeds; and (4) the impartiality of the jury goes to the very integrity of the justice system and because the right to an impartial jury is so essential to the concept of a fair trial that its violation cannot be considered harmless error. The substantial compliance standard vindicates not only the rights of the individual defendant but also the rights of the public in ensuring that the jury system remains inviolate, protecting a defendant's right to an impartial jury by encouraging reasonably strict compliance with statutory procedures intended to implement the fair cross-section guarantee of the sixth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967), Satterwhite v. Tex., 486 US 249, 100 L Ed 2d 284, 108 S Ct 1792 (1988), and Ariz. v. Fulminante, 499 US 279, 113 L Ed 302, 111 S Ct 1246 (1991), and followed in St. v. Lopez, 2001 MT 97, 305 M 218, 269 P3d 745 (2001).

Prejudice Through Inadmissible Evidence — Fair Trial Denied: Generally, character evidence is inadmissible to prove conduct. The prosecution is allowed to rebut the accused's offer of a pertinent trait of character; however, the prosecution must present legitimate and relevant character evidence. An accused's entire life should not be searched in an effort to convict. In this case, the trial court improperly allowed cross-examination of Eklund's character witness regarding Eklund's prior murder charges when the witness was called to rebut the nonviolent character evidence. The danger of unfair prejudice of evidence of charges, not a conviction, clearly outweighed the probative value. After considering the totality of the circumstances, the Supreme Court determined that there was a reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence of Eklund's murder charge denied him a fair and impartial trial and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323, 51 St. Rep. 335 (1994).

Wearing "Women Against Rape" Buttons at Rape Trial — Risk to Fair Trial: If it occurred, the presence of at least 20 women wearing "Women Against Rape" buttons at a kidnapping and rape trial posed, for various reasons, an unacceptable risk to a fair trial. The case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing on whether the allegation was true and, if true, whether a fair trial was denied. Norris v. Risley, 878 F2d 1178 (9th Cir. 1989).

Reversible Error — Prosecutor's Unethical Conduct — District Court Abuse of Discretion: After a jury trial, defendant was convicted of assault. In his opening statement, defendant's attorney had said he would call two witnesses who would testify that defendant had acted in self-defense. The State did not object to this assertion. In cross-examining the victim, defendant's attorney laid the foundation for the impeachment testimony to come from the two witnesses alluded to in the opening statement. The State did not object to this line of questioning. However, after resting its case, the State filed a motion in limine requesting that the defense not be permitted to present the testimony of the two witnesses because of the defendant's failure to comply with the notice provisions of 46-15-301 (repealed in 1985 and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329). The District Court granted the State's motion. Later, in the State's rebuttal in closing argument, the State mentioned defendant's failure to produce the witnesses he had promised during the opening statement. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and ordered a new trial. The court ruled that reversal was required by the State's unethical argument to the jury. The Supreme Court further ruled that although no formal, written notice within the time limits required under 46-15-301 (repealed in 1985 and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329) had been given, the trial court abused its discretion in not permitting the defense witnesses to testify because the State knew the defendant intended to rely on self-defense and the State's motion in limine was filed too late under local court rules. Finally, the court ruled that the State by its failure to object earlier had waived its right to file the motion in limine. St. v. Keller, 204 M 1, 662 P2d 604, 40 St. Rep. 614 (1983).

Reasonable Possibility That Inadmissible Testimony Contributed to Conviction: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, aggravated burglary, and attempted sexual intercourse without consent, contended that a mistrial should have been granted when a witness made reference to the fact that defendant had been in the state penitentiary. Defendant's motion was denied, but the court struck the material from the record and gave the jury an instruction to ignore evidence stricken from the record. The Supreme Court, applying the test of whether there was a reasonable possibility the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction, therefore requiring reversal, held that there was no evidence defendant was denied a substantial right. There was no showing that the reference might have contributed to his conviction in the face of overwhelming evidence directly proving his guilt. St. v. Wells, 202 M 337, 658 P2d 381, 40 St. Rep. 127 (1983). See also St. v. Brush, 228 M 247, 741 P2d 1333, 44 St. Rep. 1495 (1987).

Sandstrom Instruction With Statement Presumption Disputable — Intent Disputed: Reversal of mitigated deliberate homicide conviction was required where the court gave the following Sandstrom instruction: “The law also presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of any voluntary act committed by him. This presumption, however, is termed a disputable presumption and may be controverted by other evidence.” The error was not harmless. The instruction obviously permitted the jury to presume intent without proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Intent was hotly contested and an important element of the crime charged, and because of the instruction the jury could disregard the defendant’s claim that he intended only to fire a warning shot. Then, with the presumption of intent, the jury could have concluded that defendant used deadly force to intentionally kill the victim. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — No Objection Raised to Improper Argument by Prosecution — Appealability: Although objection to the prosecutor’s argument may not be raised on appeal if it has not been raised at trial, if it forms a basis for an effective assistance of counsel issue, it will be considered on appeal [but see 1983 amendment changing the law]. If a prejudicial prosecutorial argument is alleged, it will not be presumed. Rather, it must be established from the record that a substantial right has been denied. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

Presence of Accused at Trial: Under former law, the presence of the defendant at his trial was a matter that affected the substantial rights of both parties, and therefore the provision requiring the Supreme Court to give judgment on appeal without regard to technical errors or defects not affecting the substantial rights of the parties had no application. St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922).

SUBSTANTIAL RIGHTS NOT AFFECTED

Amendment Less Than Five Days Before Trial — Not Prejudicial — Defendant Not Convicted on Amended Information: The District Court did not err by allowing the state to amend the information less than 5 days before trial on an alternative charge of DUI per se. Amendments to an information “in matters of substance” may be allowed not less than 5 days before trial, providing a motion seeking leave to amend is filed in a timely manner. A court may allow an amendment “as to form” at any time before the verdict is issued, providing the amendment will not prejudice the substantial rights of the defendant. The motion to amend the information was filed 5 days before trial and was approved by the District Court the next day. Although the amendment itself was not filed at least 5 days before trial, the Supreme Court concluded that any violation of the statute was harmless because it did not prejudice the defendant given that he was not convicted of the subject of the amended information. St. v. Hudon, 2019 MT 31, 394 Mont. 226, 434 P.3d 273.

No Prejudice Arising From Lesser Included Offense Instruction — Reversal Unwarranted: Potter was charged with aggravated assault. At trial, the District Court included two lesser included offense instructions for attempted aggravated assault and assault, and Potter objected to including the attempted aggravated assault instruction. The jury returned a guilty verdict on the aggravated assault charge. On appeal, Potter contended that the court erred by instructing the jury on attempted aggravated assault because attempted aggravated assault is not a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. However, the jury never reached the question of whether Potter committed the lesser offense, so Potter was not prejudiced by inclusion of the attempted aggravated assault instruction. Absent prejudice, the Supreme Court declined to reverse the conviction. St. v. Potter, 2008 MT 381, 347 M 38, 197 P3d 471 (2008).

Mere Allegations of Cumulative Error — Reversal Not Required: Tennell identified an amalgam of errors that he alleged warranted reversal under the doctrine of cumulative error, even if no single error was sufficient to warrant reversal. The Supreme Court noted that the doctrine requires a reversal when a number of errors, taken together, prejudices the right to a fair trial, but that prejudice must be established, not merely alleged. Although some error occurred in this case, Tennell did not establish that it was prejudicial, so the court declined to apply the cumulative error doctrine. St. v. Tennell, 2007 MT 266, 339 M 381, 170 P3d 965 (2007), following St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

Counsel Ready for Trial — Motion for Continuance Properly Denied: Molder asserted that a motion to continue trial should have been granted because his substitute counsel was unprepared for trial. The Supreme Court applied the factors in St. v. Sotelo, 209 M 86, 679 P2d 779 (1984), to determine whether the trial court abused its discretion in denying a continuance, including: (1) the length of the requested delay; (2) whether the state’s case would be prejudiced; (3) reasons for the requested continuance; (4) whether defense counsel was diligent in preparing for trial; (5) whether defendant’s right to a speedy trial would be violated; and (6) defendant’s right to effective assistance of counsel. Despite Molder's assertion to the contrary, his counsel stated that a trial strategy was in place and that counsel was prepared for trial. The Supreme Court held that the trial strategy was reasonable, that Molder suffered no prejudice, and that Molder's substantial rights were not affected. Denial of the motion for continuance was affirmed. St. v. Molder, 2007 MT 41, 336 M 91, 152 P3d 722 (2007).

Failure of State to Provide Defendant With Exhibit List at Trial — Substantial Rights Not Affected: Despite the fact that the trial court had ordered the state to provide Hicks with an exhibit list 20 days before Hicks's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, the state did not comply. On the first morning of trial, Hicks moved to exclude all of the state's proposed exhibits, but the motion was denied, and Hicks later appealed on grounds of unfair surprise and prejudice. However, Hicks did not refer to specific exhibits or analyze why the exhibits were prejudicial, and Hicks's mere conclusory statement was insufficient to establish that the defense was prejudiced. In addition, the state contended that Hicks knew about the exhibits well prior to trial, that he had been provided copies of the exhibits, and that he knew the state intended to introduce the exhibits, so Hicks could not argue surprise despite not being provided with an exhibit list. Hicks's substantial rights were not affected, and denial of the motion to exclude the exhibits was affirmed. St. v. Hicks, 2006 MT 71, 331 M 471, 133 P3d 206 (2006).

Only Error Curable by Resentencing — Cumulative Error Doctrine Inapplicable: Although Ferguson asserted many errors in his trial and sentencing, the only error found by the Supreme Court was that Ferguson was sentenced as a violent offender, and that error was cured by remand for resentencing Ferguson as a nonviolent offender. Therefore, because Ferguson was not prejudiced, the court declined to apply the cumulative error doctrine. St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

Counsel's Failure to Interview and Call Witnesses Within Range of Reasonable and Sound Professional Decisions — Failure to Prove Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Weaver contended that his defense counsel was ineffective in failing to interview and call certain witnesses and in not introducing an entomologist's report that might have created a reasonable doubt as to Weaver's role in a homicide. Under the first prong of the Strickland test, Weaver needed to overcome the strong presumption that counsel's defense strategies and trial tactics fell within a wide range of reasonable and sound professional decisions. The Supreme Court examined each of Weaver's contentions and determined that: (1) counsel's decision not to investigate potential witnesses did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness; (2) Weaver failed to meet the burden of showing that counsel's failure to interview potential witnesses constituted ineffective assistance to the extent that it resulted in prejudice raising a reasonable probability that the trial outcome would have been different; (3) counsel's decision not to call every witness that Weaver identified actually carried fewer risks and promoted Weaver's best interest at trial; and (4) failure to introduce the entomologist's report was tactical and the result of a conscientious, weighed decision made after consultation with Weaver and thus was not erroneous. Weaver's ineffective assistance claim failed. Weaver v. St., 2005 MT 158, 327 M 441, 114 P3d 1039 (2005), following Clausell v. St., 2005 MT 33, 326 M 63, 106 P3d 1175 (2005).

Prosecutor's Comments Not Affecting Outcome of Trial — Failure to Prove Prosecutorial Misconduct: Clausell's defense in a deliberate homicide trial was that the victim's death was a "tragic accident". Because of Clausell's defense, his counsel failed to object to numerous comments by the prosecutor that focused on rebutting the "tragic accident" theory. On appeal, Clausell contended that the prosecutor's statements constituted prosecutorial misconduct and that his attorney's failure to object to the comments or to move to suppress evidence of the search of Clausell's apartment amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed on both issues. Given that the state presented sufficient evidence of deliberate homicide and that the jury was admonished to consider only the evidence, Clausell failed to show that the prosecutor's comments affected the trial's outcome. Because no prosecutorial misconduct occurred, defense counsel's failure to object to the comments could not be considered ineffective assistance, and defense counsel's trial tactics, including failure to seek to suppress evidence that was in plain view, fell within the wide range of reasonable and sound professional decisions. Clausell failed to establish that his attorney's lack of objections fell below the objective reasonableness standard or that he was prejudiced to the point that a reasonable probability existed that the result of the trial would have been different had counsel not performed ineffectively. The deliberate homicide conviction was affirmed. Clausell v. St., 2005 MT 33, 326 M 63, 106 P3d 1175 (2005), followed in St. v. Misner, 2007 MT 235, 339 M 176, 168 P3d 679 (2007). See also St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262 (1983).

Failure to Provide Notice That Arresting Officer Would Appear as Witness — No Error: At Boettiger's DUI bench trial in Justice's Court, the arresting officer testified regarding Boettiger's actions on the day in question. Boettiger was convicted and appealed to District Court, but the state did not provide Boettiger with written notice that the officer would again be a witness. Nevertheless, the District Court allowed the officer to testify over Boettiger's objection, and Boettiger's counsel subjected the officer to extensive cross-examination. Boettiger was again convicted and on appeal alleged error in the state's failure to list the officer as a potential witness. The Supreme Court did not condone the failure to provide notice but found that Boettiger knew that the officer would testify again and failed to demonstrate prejudice as a result of the officer's testimony. The Supreme Court disregarded the irregularity because it did not affect Boettiger's substantive rights, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Boettiger, 2004 MT 313, 324 M 20, 101 P3d 285 (2004), following St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307 (1997).

Error for Prosecutor to Comment on Defendant's Post-Miranda Silence Regardless When Warning Given: Following arrest on sexual assault and attempted sexual intercourse without consent charges, Godfrey received an acknowledgment of rights form from his attorney. Godfrey initialed the form and subsequently went over the form with the District Court during his initial appearance. Godfrey later complained that the state prosecutor violated Godfrey's due process rights by commenting at trial on Godfrey's silence, in violation of Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976). The state contended that because Godfrey did not have his Miranda rights read to him by a police officer at the time of arrest, Doyle did not apply. The Supreme Court found the state's argument to be without merit and declined to distinguish between a situation when a defendant is advised of the right to remain silent by an arresting officer and a situation when a defendant is advised of the right by a court, or to distinguish between an oral warning and a written form. However, in this case, Godfrey's counsel did not object to the prosecutor's comments at trial, so the court had to decide whether the trial error was sufficiently prejudicial to trigger plain error review. After reviewing the record, the court concluded that it was not plain that the prosecutor's comments had created an inference for the jury that by remaining silent, Godfrey must have been guilty. Absent a clear comment on or infringement of Godfrey's fundamental right to remain silent and absent a contemporaneous objection by Godfrey's counsel to the prosecutor's comments, the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Godfrey, 2004 MT 197, 322 M 254, 95 P3d 166 (2004). See also St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), and St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P2d 1033 (1996).

Record-Based Claims of Ineffective Counsel for Failure to Object Considered on Direct Appeal and Denied: Daniels claimed on direct appeal that he was denied effective assistance of counsel because defense counsel failed to investigate and interview certain witnesses in order to present a case in chief and failed to object to certain trial testimony. The state responded that Daniels could not demonstrate that counsel's actions were not objectively reasonable or that there was a reasonable possibility that counsel's errors caused a prejudicial result. The Supreme Court noted that Daniels' claims concerning failure to investigate were not record-based and thus not subject to review on direct appeal, pursuant to Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), and St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001). Regarding the record-based claims of failure to object, the court agreed with the state. The evidence in question was admissible, so counsel was not required to object and could not be considered ineffective for failing to do so. Absent a showing of counsel's deficient performance, Daniels' conviction was affirmed. St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003).

Attorney's Actions Reasonable and Not Prejudicial — Strickland Test for Ineffective Assistance Not Met: Allen contended on appeal that he received ineffective assistance from trial counsel because counsel failed to: (1) conduct an adequate investigation of the underlying facts of the case; (2) call a witness at trial regarding Allen's possession of a gun; and (3) present evidence at the sentencing hearing that Allen had four rather than five prior felony convictions. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel and affirmed. Nothing in the record showed that counsel failed to investigate; in fact, counsel's investigative choices were reasonable. The decision not to call a witness to testify that Allen did not have a gun was also reasonable, given that the jury had already heard testimony from other witnesses that Allen did not have a gun before or after the offense, and counsel was not obligated to present cumulative evidence. Moreover, Allen failed to demonstrate how counsel's failure to investigate the number of Allen's prior felony convictions was prejudicial or would have affected the outcome of the trial because there was plenty of prior conviction information in Allen's record upon which to base the felony offender sentence, so even if the information was incorrect as to the number of convictions, it was not material to Allen's sentence. St. v. Allen, 2001 MT 266, 307 M 253, 37 P3d 655 (2001).

Improper for Prosecutor to Inform Jury of Potential Sentences During Closing Argument — Prejudice Because of Prosecutorial Misconduct Not Established: In closing arguments, the prosecutor commented to the jury that because Martin did not face a death penalty, he could argue that the judge could give him whatever sentence falls within the judge's power, ranging from probation to life in prison. The Supreme Court has held that it is improper to instruct the jury on possible sentences (see St. v. Zuidema, 157 M 367, 485 P2d 952 (1971)), and it is likewise considered misconduct for a prosecutor to inform a jury regarding possible sentences in closing arguments. However, the court will not presume prejudice from charges of prosecutorial misconduct, but will also consider whether the misconduct prejudiced the defendant's substantial rights. Martin asserted that the prosecutor raised the subject of the judge's sentencing discretion in order to influence the jury to find Martin guilty of all the greater offenses rather than any of the lesser included offenses, making a light sentence unlikely. Here, the Supreme Court reviewed the evidence and found it sufficient to support the jury's verdicts. In light of the surrounding circumstances, including the context in which the comments were made, Martin failed to establish prejudice from the sentencing-related remark by the prosecutor during rebuttal closing arguments. St. v. Martin, 2001 MT 83, 305 M 123, 23 P3d 216 (2001), followed in St. v. Roubideaux, 2005 MT 324, 329 M 521, 125 P3d 1114 (2005).

Admission of Murder by Schizophrenic Held Voluntarily Made — No Prejudice to Defense Case: Scarborough, a schizophrenic, was arrested for the murder of Willis and made incriminating statements in the back of a police car. He was taken to the police station where he was read his Miranda rights, waived those rights, and gave a recorded interview with a detective. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision not to suppress the statements made in the police car or the tape of the interview with the detective. After reviewing all of the evidence, the Supreme Court held that the single fact that raised doubts about the voluntariness of Scarborough's inculpatory statements is the fact that he is schizophrenic and was therefore subject to the suggestion by the arresting and interviewing officers that he had committed the crime rather than someone else. The Supreme Court reviewed the record of the circumstances of the confessions and held that they were not made because the police had suggested Scarborough's guilt to him. The Supreme Court also held that even if the confessions were involuntary, the admission of those confessions by the District Court did not prejudice Scarborough's defense because, as his defense, Scarborough admitted committing the murder but claimed that the murder was committed during an acute psychotic episode. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Jurors' Notes to Court During Deliberations Not Grounds for Mistrial: During deliberations, the jury sent several notes and questions to the court regarding one of the jurors, who was felt to be obstructing deliberations. Defendant's motion for mistrial based on breakdown in the deliberative process was denied. Following conviction, the juror in question prepared an affidavit alleging that he was unaware of the notes and would not have voted for a guilty verdict had he known about them. The District Court struck the affidavit, finding no juror misconduct, in effect denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court held that the notes constituted an entirely internal process and did not introduce an extraneous or outside element into deliberations, signal a breakdown in deliberations, or have any bearing on defendant's guilt or innocence. Even assuming that the notes had somehow affected the juror's vote, introduction of such testimony is prohibited under Rule 606(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and the affidavit was properly stricken. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Prosecutorial Comments During Closing Not Violative of Defendant's Right to Fair Trial: Raugust argued on appeal that the prosecutor's comments during closing arguments deprived Raugust of a fair trial, notwithstanding the failure of Raugust's attorney to object, which Raugust characterized as ineffective assistance of counsel. Under 46-20-104, review is barred of any alleged errors not objected to at trial, unless the error falls within the exceptions in subsection (2) of this section, but Raugust nevertheless urged review under the plain error doctrine. The Supreme Court held that this case did not present the requisite exceptional case to invoke the plain error doctrine because the alleged errors were either misstatements of fact, taken out of context of the prosecutor's argument, constituted the state's analysis of the evidence, or were later cured by the jury instructions. Raugust's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel also failed because Raugust did not meet the first prong of the Strickland test by showing that his counsel's performance was deficient. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St. Rep. 570 (2000). See also St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827 (1999), St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), and St. v. Wing, 2008 MT 218, 344 M 243, 188 P3d 999 (2008).

Testimonial Privilege Not Extended to Nonclerical Church Member — No Prejudice in Admission of Member's Testimony: Testimonial privileges must be strictly construed because they contravene the fundamental principle that the public has the right to everyone's evidence; however, the clergy-penitent privilege in 26-1-804 will not be so strictly construed as to violate the right to freedom of religion in Art. II, sec. 5, Mont. Const. Here, Gooding claimed that testimony regarding his confessions of sexual molestation of his stepdaughter in the presence of the wife of a nonordained junior minister was privileged. However, nothing in the record indicated that the wife was a clergy member acting in a professional character, a counselor, or anything more than an ordinary confidant. The Supreme Court declined to extend the clergy-penitent privilege to nonclerical church members and, in light of overwhelming uncontradicted evidence of Gooding's guilt, affirmed his conviction regardless of the wife's testimony. St. v. Gooding, 1999 MT 249, 296 M 234, 989 P2d 304, 56 St. Rep. 977 (1999). See also St. v. MacKinnon, 1998 MT 78, 288 M 329, 957 P2d 23, 55 St. Rep. 331 (1998).

No Pretrial Determination Regarding Whether Statement Admissible for Impeachment Purposes — Waiver of Right to Object to Admissibility: At the time of arrest, Harris admitted an act of sexual intercourse with his adopted daughter. Prior to trial, Harris moved to suppress the statement on grounds that it was involuntary and obtained in violation of his fifth amendment rights under the United States Constitution. The District Court agreed that the statement could not be used, but expressly stated that its limited suppression order did not address whether it could be used by the state for impeachment purposes in the event that Harris testified, essentially reserving its ruling for a later time, as authorized in 46-13-104. Harris's testimony about the statement during direct examination brought the statement into evidence by his own volition, constituting waiver of the right to appeal the admissibility of the statement for use as impeachment. St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996), and St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Error in Requiring Summaries of Defense Witnesses' Testimony — Due Process Violated — No Prejudicial Error Found: When Huerta was tried on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of a juvenile, he attempted to introduce testimony of 26 witnesses who would testify that the child's mother had the habit of severely punishing the child. In an effort to reduce delay caused by redundant testimony, the District Court required Huerta to summarize the testimony of all of the witnesses by affidavits. Huerta claimed that the required affidavits were ordered in violation of 46-15-328 and in violation of his due process rights because a similar burden was not placed upon the prosecution. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's order was in violation of 46-15-323(8), which specifically prohibits summaries of defense testimony, and in violation of Huerta's right of due process because Wardius v. Oreg., 412 US 470 (1973), and State ex rel. Carkulis v. District Court, 229 M 265, 746 P2d 604 (1987), require reciprocal discovery. However, the Supreme Court also held that Huerta did not establish that the violation of his rights was reversible error pursuant to this section because he failed to show how the violations of statute and due process affected the outcome of the trial. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 483, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Failure to Use Different Test Solution Than That Used in Prior Test in Testing Breathalyzer That Failed Prior Certification Test: Administrative rules require the state to use a fresh ethyl alcohol testing solution in retesting and certifying a Breathalyzer when the results of a prior test of the Breathalyzer are outside the range specified by the rules. The state did not do so and used the same solution as that used in the prior test. However, DUI defendant was not prejudiced thereby because the evidence showed that the problem was clearly with the Breathalyzer, not the solution. St. v. Woods, 285 M 124, 947 P2d 62, 54 St. Rep. 1074 (1997).

Jury Request for Replay of Partial Testimony — Failure to Give Harris Instruction Not Prejudicial to Defendant: Henrich was charged with various crimes resulting from sexual assault upon his daughters. The jury requested that it be allowed to hear a recording of certain testimony, whereupon the District Court determined the relevant portion of the testimony and allowed part of a victim's testimony to be played to the jury during its deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that it was error for the District Court not to give the instruction required by St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991). However, the Supreme Court held that because the only testimony as to the issues concerned in the recording was given by the witness and the defendant, the jury's need to balance the statements in the recording against the defendant's denial of committing the offense was obvious and therefore the need for the Harris instruction was minimal. The Supreme Court therefore held that the defendant was not prejudiced by the playing of the recording. St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994).

Failure to Object to Alleged Prosecutorial Misconduct Not Violation of Right to Fair Trial: Defendant alleged that the state engaged in prosecutorial misconduct by eliciting inadmissible evidence with no factual basis, characterizing witnesses as liars, using misleading and inflammatory arguments, expressing personal opinions, and using the complaining witness's religious beliefs to enhance her credibility. The Supreme Court refused to exercise discretionary review in light of the fact that not one objection was made by defense counsel in any instance of claimed misconduct. Absent any record of error not objected to that demonstrated an infringement of the substantial rights of defendant, the right to a fair trial was not infringed. St. v. Ogle, 255 M 246, 841 P2d 1133, 49 St. Rep. 932 (1992), followed in St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996).

Interpretation of Law by Counsel in Jury's Presence: In response to a question from the jury, the County Attorney stated to the judge his interpretation of whether sexual gratification is a requirement of the crime of sexual intercourse without consent. While counsel should avoid stating their interpretation of the law in the presence of the jury, in this case the comments were a correct statement of the law and therefore did not adversely affect substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991).

Identification of Witness During Closing Argument as Defendant's Probation Officer — No Prejudice: In accord with an order in limine that no reference was to be made at trial to defendant's criminal record, the testimony of defendant's probation officer and records introduced in connection with her testimony were sanitized at trial. However, in closing, the prosecution referred to the testimony of the defendant's probation officer, which defendant contended on appeal was a violation of the Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), restriction on introduction of evidence of other crimes without formal notice. The Supreme Court, noting that several references had been made to defendant's criminal record by defendant's own witnesses by the time closing arguments were made, found that identification of the parole officer was not prejudicial to the defense. St. v. West, 245 M 298, 800 P2d 1047, 47 St. Rep. 2129 (1990).

Introduction of Two Prior DUI Convictions Not Prejudicial: The defendant argued that he was prejudiced by the introduction of two prior DUI convictions and that his attorney's failure to object constituted inadequate legal assistance. The Supreme Court found that although the lower court was mistaken in its belief that the prior convictions had to be introduced as an element of this offense, their admission did not prejudice the defendant, particularly in light of the substantial evidence against the defendant and an almost total absence of evidence on his behalf. St. v. Kolberg, 241 M 105, 785 P2d 702, 47 St. Rep. 120 (1990).

Prosecutor's Solicitation of Excluded Evidence: The defendant contended that he was denied a fair trial because the prosecutor elicited testimony from the arresting officer concerning statements made by the defendant at the time of his arrest that had been ruled inadmissible by the trial court. The Supreme Court ruled that the error in admitting the evidence was cured by the trial court's admonishing the jury to disregard the inadmissible statements. St. v. Kolberg, 241 M 105, 785 P2d 702, 47 St. Rep. 120 (1990).

Prosecution Comments on Witnesses in Opening and Closing — No Objection — No Effect on Substantial Rights: The prosecution in opening and closing made comments on the truthfulness and credibility of witnesses and other matters not related to the defendant's right not to testify. A lack of objection does not preclude consideration in the trial court of error that affects the defendant's substantial rights, but these matters were subject to free comment to the jury under the circumstances of this case and thus did not affect substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Harris, 209 M 511, 682 P2d 159, 41 St. Rep. 866 (1984).

Instructions Given and Instructions Rejected — Review of Both Precluded by Failure to Object: Defendant contended that jury instructions given by the District Court were improper and that rejected instructions should have been given. No objection to the instructions was raised at trial. Instructions cannot be challenged for the first time on appeal. The errors asserted did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant and were disregarded. St. v. Wurtz, 195 M 226, 636 P2d 246, 38 St. Rep. 1808 (1981).

PLAIN ERROR

Right to Testify at Trial — Assertion That Defendant Did Not Get to Decide Whether to Testify — No Plain Error: A defendant did not demonstrate that the District Court committed plain error by failing to make a record inquiry and determination as to whether he validly waived his right to testify at trial when he asserted during sentencing that he was talked out of testifying at the last minute and that he did not get to make a decision about testifying despite signing a written acknowledgment of his rights and multiple opportunities to discuss the matter with his counsel because the defendant was represented by counsel, had ample opportunity and did in fact consult with counsel before deciding to testify, was acutely aware of his right to testify, and at worst acquiesced to counsel's advice to not testify in order to avoid incriminating himself. St. v. Abel, 2021 MT 293, 406 Mont. 250, 498 P.3d 199.

Prosecutor's Comments About Rising Insurance Rates During Closing Not Prejudicial in Context of Evidence Presented: During the state's closing argument at a trial for felony theft by insurance fraud, the prosecutor referred to rising insurance rates as a result of insurance fraud. The defendant did not object at the time, but on appeal he asked the Supreme Court to exercise plain error review of the remarks. The Supreme Court declined, holding that because of other evidence in the record regarding the fraud, the defendant could not demonstrate that the prosecutor's reference to rising rates was prejudicial in this context. St. v. Schaeffer, 2014 MT 47, 374 Mont. 93, 321 P.3d 809.

Prosecutor's Comments to Prospective Jurors and Closing Argument Not Improper: The defendant appealed his convictions of failure to wear a seatbelt and DUI on the basis that the prosecutor's comments during voir dire and closing argument deprived the defendant of a fair trial before an impartial jury. The Supreme Court declined to invoke plain error review, concluding no reversible error was committed during the defendant's trial. The record did not indicate that the prosecutor's reference to different levels of intoxication and discussion with a prospective juror regarding the DUI-related death of the juror's friend's daughter inflamed or prejudiced the jury against the defendant. In addition, the prosecutor's statement during closing argument, which implied that because the defendant was an impaired driver, he would not have been able to brake properly had a child been playing in the road, fell within the latitude afforded to attorneys' closing arguments. Billings v. Staebler, 2011 MT 254, 362 Mont. 231, 262 P.3d 1101.

Clarification of Finley Plain Error Test: The language in St. v. Wagner, 2009 MT 256, 352 Mont. 1, 215 P.3d 20, that a fundamental aspect of plain error is that the alleged error must indeed be plain is not a free-standing third requirement outside the two-part plain error test set out in St. v. Finley, 276 Mont. 126, 915 P.2d 208 (1996), but is rather a means by which the Supreme Court may analyze whether the second Finley criterion has been satisfied, namely whether failure to review the alleged error would rise to the level of a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial, or compromise the integrity of the judicial system. St. v. Taylor, 2010 MT 94, 356 Mont. 167, 231 P.3d 79.

Prosecutor's Repeated and Deliberate Use of Defendant's Invocation of Right to Silence — New Trial Warranted: During Wagner's trial for attempted deliberate homicide, the prosecutor repeatedly and deliberately used Wagner's invocation of the right to silence as evidence of Wagner's guilt. The prosecutor also referenced Wagner's failure to tell his version of events until trial and raised as further evidence of Wagner's guilt the fact that Wagner had requested to speak with an attorney and, after invoking his Miranda rights, had commented that he didn't want to dig himself a deeper hole. The Supreme Court found that Wagner's request to speak with an attorney and the comment that Wagner didn't want to dig himself a deeper hole were in fact an invocation of Wagner's right to remain silent. The prosecutor's conduct raised questions regarding the fundamental fairness of the trial by violating Wagner's right to due process and privilege against self-incrimination, constituting plain error, and the Supreme Court concluded that the constitutional violations entitled Wagner to a new trial. The case was reversed. St. v. Wagner, 2009 MT 256, 352 M 1, 215 P.3d 20 (2009), following Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976). See also St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P.2d 1033 (1996).

Issue Decided Prior to Appeal — No Substantial Reason for Plain Error Review: Foston appealed a drug conviction on grounds that plain error review was appropriate because officers improperly used warrantless electronic monitoring of drug transactions in violation of St. v. Goetz, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P.3d 489 (2008). However, Foston made no warrant-based objection at trial, and Goetz was decided after Foston's conviction. The Supreme Court also noted that a motion to retroactively apply Goetz to Foston's case had previously been denied. The court therefore refused to grant plain error review absent any substantial reason provided by Foston why plain error review was warranted. St. v. Foston, 2009 MT 191, 351 M 85, 209 P.3d 262 (2009), overruled, to the extent that it requires objection to warrantless recordings to be made at trial, by St. v. Reichmand, 2010 MT 228, 358 Mont. 68, 243 P.3d 423.

Failure to Object to Prosecutor's Closing Arguments — Waiver of Objection: Defendant contended that he was denied a fair trial because of comments made by the prosecutor during closing arguments regarding defendant's credibility. However, defendant failed to object and preserve the issue for appeal, so the objection was waived. Nevertheless, defendant urged the Supreme Court to employ discretionary plain error review and reverse, but the court was not persuaded that the comments resulted in a manifest miscarriage of justice, undermined the fundamental fairness of the trial, or compromised the integrity of the judicial process, so plain error review was denied. St. v. Rose, 2009 MT 4, 348 M 291, 202 P3d 749 (2009). See also St. v. Cooksey, 2012 MT 226, 366 Mont. 346, 286 P.3d 1174.

Involuntary Commitment — Failure to Appoint Friend of Respondent Reversible Error: In an involuntary commitment case, the District Court made no serious attempt to appoint a friend of respondent for the individual and committed the individual to the state mental hospital. The individual appealed. Because the case involved a substantial liberty interest and failure to review the error would compromise the integrity of the judicial process, the Supreme Court reviewed the case under the plain error doctrine and remanded. The District Court essentially ignored the statutory requirement in 53-21-122 to appoint a friend of respondent, constituting reversible error. In re Mental Health of J.D.L., 2008 MT 445, 348 M 1, 199 P3d 805 (2008), followed in In re Mental Health of A.S.F., 2008 MT 450, 348 M 45, 199 P3d 808 (2008).

Delay in Bringing Defendant Before District Court on Petition to Revoke Suspended Sentence Implicated Due Process Rights: Defendant made a threshold showing that plain error review of his claim was appropriate for a delay of 26 months in bringing him before the court on a petition to revoke a suspended sentence. However, delay was only one of several factors for the court to consider in the totality of circumstances approach to unreasonableness of delay, and thus the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing. St. v. West, 2008 MT 338, 346 M 244, 194 P3d 683, (2008).

Failure to Preserve Issue for Appeal by Failure to Object at Trial — Plain Error Review Inappropriate Absent Implication of Defendant's Fundamental Rights: At Price's trial for assault with a weapon, a stun gun, the trial court allowed evidence of Price's prior conviction for intimidation. Following conviction, Price appealed on grounds that the evidence was improperly introduced because the state failed to give notice of the intent to introduce other crimes evidence in violation of Price's due process rights. The state contended that Price waived the right to appeal the issue by failing to object to introduction of the evidence and by actively participating in its introduction. The Supreme Court declined to review the issue because Price failed to object to the evidence at trial and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal. Further, plain error review was inappropriate because Price's fundamental constitutional rights were not implicated by introduction of the evidence. St. v. Price, 2007 MT 269, 339 M 399, 171 P3d 293 (2007), followed in St. v. Thorp, 2010 MT 92, 356 Mont. 150, 231 P.3d 1096.

Plain Error Review of Effective Assistance Claim Denied When Error Not Plain: Defendant sought to have the Supreme Court review whether it was error for defense counsel to withdraw a juror challenge, resulting in ineffective assistance of counsel. The court could not plainly determine from the record if the withdrawal was erroneous, given possible tactical reasons for the withdrawal. Absent a record-based showing that the alleged error was plain, plain error review was inappropriate. St. v. Tennell, 2007 MT 266, 339 M 381, 170 P3d 965 (2007).

Absence of Record Prevents Review of Defendant's Claim of Lack of Speedy Trial Under Plain Error Doctrine: The state charged Lewis with certain drug-related crimes on May 19, 2004, and on October 12, 2004, informed the trial court that it intended to charge Lewis with an additional offense, whereupon the trial court vacated the trial date. The state did not amend the charges until March 10, 2005, and Lewis was convicted after a 3-day trial in June of 2005. Lewis did not assert the right to a speedy trial until appeal. The Supreme Court agreed that the right to a speedy trial is not necessarily waived by failure to assert the right at trial and that the Supreme Court could review the issue under the plain error doctrine. However, the Supreme Court held that the review must be based upon the facts of the case, and in the present instance, no record existed upon which to review the matter. St. v. Lewis, 2007 MT 16, 335 M 331, 151 P3d 883 (2007).

Valid Designated Representative Allowed to Remain in Court During Trial and to Testify — Former State Employee Not Considered Proper Designated Representative at Trial: The trial court granted the state's motion to exclude all witnesses pursuant to Rule 615, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The state designated former employee Weaver as its representative, and Weaver was allowed to remain in the courtroom at the counsel table while other witnesses testified. Plaintiffs were unaware until Weaver began to testify that Weaver was no longer employed by the state and contended that Weaver should not have been permitted to testify as a fact witness after all witnesses had been excluded, citing St. v. Claric, 271 M 141, 894 P2d 946 (1995), and St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004). The Supreme Court clarified Rule 615, M.R.Ev., noting that the plain language of the rule provides that both a natural person who is a party and a designated representative of a party who is not a natural person may remain in the courtroom notwithstanding the exclusion of other witnesses. Thus, Claric and Flowers were overruled to the extent that those cases held that a valid designated representative may not both remain in the courtroom and testify. However, the rule also provides that an appropriate designated representative is an officer or employee of a party who is not a natural person. Weaver was no longer a state employee and thus did not qualify as a proper representative at retrial. Faulconbridge v. St., 2006 MT 198, 333 M 186, 142 P3d 777 (2006).

Alleged Error Must Be Plain to Trigger Plain Error Review: English argued that the Supreme Court should apply plain error review to consider whether certain trial testimony violated English's constitutional right to remain silent. However, English could not point to how the allegedly offensive testimony affected the fairness of the trial or resulted in a miscarriage of justice, especially because part of the testimony was elicited by English's own counsel, who had the opportunity to object to any erroneous testimony but declined to do so. A fundamental aspect of the plain error doctrine is that the alleged error must be plain. In this case, if there was any error, it was not plain, and the Supreme Court declined to invoke the doctrine to address English's constitutional issues. St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Ineffective Counsel Claims Insufficient to Invoke Plain Error Doctrine on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Novak contended that his counsel's failure to object to certain prejudicial, inadmissible evidence compromised his right to a fair trial and asserted that the Supreme Court should apply the plain error doctrine to review counsel's failure. The Supreme Court held that all of the alleged errors were encompassed in Novak's effective assistance of counsel claim, which could be raised in postconviction proceedings, but were insufficient to invoke the plain error doctrine on direct appeal. St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005).

Failure of Counsel to Ensure Impartial Jury During Voir Dire Constituting Ineffective Assistance — Reversible Structural Error: A potential juror disclosed in a juror questionnaire that her daughter was a paralegal at the County Attorney's office. Defense counsel failed to take note of the disclosure, to question the juror regarding any potential bias during voir dire, or to challenge the juror for cause. Defense counsel acknowledged the error on the record. The juror was picked for the panel, and Lamere was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the two-pronged Strickland test for ineffective assistance, and because the error was on the record, the court reviewed the ineffective assistance claim de novo on direct appeal. The court concluded that counsel failed to ensure that Lamere received a fair trial by an impartial jury and that counsel's performance fell below the reasonably required level, satisfying the first Strickland prong. In addition, counsel's deficient performance constituted a structural error that undermined the fairness of the entire trial and thus was presumed to be prejudicial, satisfying the second Strickland prong. Lamere did not receive effective assistance during voir dire, the verdict was reversed, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Lamere, 2005 MT 118, 327 M 115, 112 P3d 1005 (2005). See also St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002), and St. v. Deveraux, 2022 MT 130, 409 Mont. 177, 512 P.3d 1198.

Failure to Object to Jury Instruction — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim Unfounded — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: The trial court instructed the jury that Gray could be convicted of assault on a peace officer if the state proved that Gray caused a reasonable apprehension of bodily harm in any of three police officers. Gray contended that the instruction erroneously allowed the jury to convict for assault of one or more of the officers without agreeing to one specific set of facts, in violation of the unanimity requirement that the jury must be in agreement as to the principal factual elements underlying the offense. Even though Gray's counsel acquiesced to the instruction, Gray contended that the fundamental right to a unanimous jury verdict is inviolate, so plain error review was appropriate. However, Gray not only failed to contemporaneously object to the instruction, but specifically asked the trial court to add the language that he argued on appeal was insufficient. The Supreme Court declined to apply the doctrine, refusing to put the trial court in error for an action in which Gray acquiesced and actively participated. Additionally, Gray's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on his attorney's acquiescence and participation in the jury instruction for strategic purposes also failed. In light of the overwhelming evidence of guilt, Gray could not show that the trial outcome was prejudiced because of the lack of a specific unanimity instruction or that the result would have been different if the attorney had not engaged in the legal strategy. The conviction was affirmed. St. v. Gray, 2004 MT 347, 324 M 334, 102 P3d 1255 (2004), followed in St. v. Gallagher, 2005 MT 336, 330 M 65, 125 P3d 1141 (2005). See also St. v. Birthmark, 2013 MT 86, 369 Mont. 413, 300 P.3d 1140.

Plain Error in Allowing Youth's Extrajudicial Statements When Youth Not Advised of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination: A youth asserted for the first time on appeal that the Youth Court improperly admitted extrajudicial statements that the youth made regarding the youth's whereabouts when a burglary and criminal mischief were committed. Despite the state's contention that the arguments should not be considered because they were not raised at trial, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered the argument under the plain error doctrine because the youth was not notified while in custody of the fundamental right to counsel and the right to avoid self-incrimination, nor were the youth's parents notified as required. The youth's rights under the Montana Youth Court Act and the constitution were simply ignored in this case, so in order to avoid a question of the fundamental fairness of the trial by admission of constitutionally infirm extrajudicial statements, the Supreme Court reversed the trial court's decision to admit the statements. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

No Plain Error in Presenting Different Stories of Same Witness for Jury's Consideration: At Daniels' trial for robbery, witnesses presented inconsistent testimony regarding Daniels' involvement. The state was entitled to point out the inconsistencies to the jury, and the jury was entitled to choose which version to believe. There was no fundamental unfairness or error in presenting different stories of the same witness for the jury's consideration, and thus Daniels was not entitled to consideration on appeal under the plain error doctrine. St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003).

Theory of Erroneous Jury Instruction Raised for First Time on Appeal — No Plain Error: At trial, the District Court instructed the jury to view with distrust the testimony of a witness who was legally accountable for the same crime as Daniels. Daniels objected to the instruction on grounds that the witness's testimony had changed and was no longer inculpatory, so the instruction was unnecessary. On appeal, Daniels argued that the instruction violated his right to a fair trial because it could have been construed to instruct the jury to distrust his exculpatory statements given to police immediately after his arrest, having implicated the witness in those statements. The Supreme Court found no prejudicial effect in the jury instruction, and Daniels could not argue on appeal a theory of error that was changed from the theory raised in trial court. St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), followed in St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003).

Conviction of Felony Nonsupport Prior to Legislative Creation of Felony Offense Considered Improper Ex Post Facto Application Warranting Reversal — Common-Law Plain Error Doctrine Applied: Price was convicted of felony nonsupport for failure to make payments from 1988 through 1996 and was given the maximum 2-year sentence; however, the felony nonsupport statute was not enacted until 1993. On appeal, Price contended that the manner in which the felony nonsupport statute was applied violated the fundamental constitutional right to be free from ex post facto laws. The state argued that because Price failed to object at trial, the issue could not be raised on appeal. The issue of whether Price was convicted of felony nonsupport that occurred before the statute was enacted brought into question the fundamental fairness of Price's trial. The Supreme Court held that because a fundamental right was at issue, the common-law plain error doctrine applied despite Price's failure to preserve the issue at trial. A jury instruction allowed the jury to find Price guilty based on acts committed from 1988 through 1996 and thus subjected Price to increased punishment for conduct that occurred prior to enactment of the felony statute. This was an unconstitutional ex post facto application of the felony nonsupport law, constituting reversible error. St. v. Price, 2002 MT 284, 312 M 458, 59 P3d 1122 (2002).

Prosecutor's Comment Alleging Uncontradicted Evidence Erroneous When Defendant Who Asserted Right to Remain Silent Was Only Person Who Could Offer Contradictory Evidence — Error Harmless: Harrington was arrested for DUI, was read his Miranda rights, and chose to remain silent. Harrington contended that his due process rights and privilege against self-incrimination were violated by testimony elicited and statements made by the prosecution during trial. Although Harrington failed to preserve the issues in the District Court, the Supreme Court applied the plain error doctrine pursuant to its discretionary power enunciated in St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), considering the totality of the circumstances and evaluating the nature of the constitutional rights implicated, rather than the sufficiency of the evidence. The court decided that because no comment was made that Harrington at any time refused to give a statement or refused to testify and because the prosecutor did not insinuate that an innocent person would have given a statement or testified, no Doyle error occurred (see Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976)). However, the prosecutor did comment during rebuttal that there was no evidence to contradict the state's case, which was error as an improper reference to Harrington's decision not to testify because Harrington was the only person who could have offered contradictory testimony (see St. v. Hart, 154 M 310, 462 P2d 885 (1969)). To determine whether the error was prejudicial, the court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001). The error was considered a trial error rather than a structural error, and because the error concerned comment rather than evidence, the court went on to determine whether it was harmless and contributed to the conviction. In this case, the single comment that the evidence was uncontradicted was an isolated one, and there was no reasonable possibility that it contributed to Harrington's conviction given the fact that during closing, the prosecutor focused on the driving errors Harrington made before being stopped, the videotape of Harrington's field sobriety tests, the arresting officer's expertise, and the results of the preliminary breath test. Harrington's constitutional rights were not prejudiced by the improper reference to his decision not to testify. Columbus v. Harrington, 2001 MT 258, 307 M 215, 36 P3d 937 (2001).

Common-Law Plain Error — Defendant Must Demonstrate With Specifics That a Fundamental Constitutional Right Was Violated at Trial: Whipple claimed that the trial court erred in allowing five witnesses to testify as to the credibility of the testimony of two minors who testified that Whipple had sexually abused them. The Supreme Court stated that because claims of plain error are almost always raised for the first time on appeal, a defendant must do more than simply make a generalized claim that the defendant's rights were violated by the alleged error. See St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996). The Supreme Court stated that it would not exercise its power of common-law plain error review of alleged errors not objected to at trial because Whipple had not met his burden of demonstrating specifically how a constitutional right of his had been violated by an error of the trial court. St. v. Whipple, 2001 MT 16, 304 M 118, 19 P3d 228 (2001).

Prosecutor's Comments on Defendant's Post-Miranda Silence — Violation of Right to Due Process and Privilege Against Self-Incrimination Reviewable Under Plain Error Doctrine: At trial for deliberate homicide, the prosecutor commented on the defendant's post-Miranda silence in the opening statement, introduced testimony regarding the defendant's refusal to make a statement, and commented twice during the closing statement about the defendant's silence. The defense counsel did not comment or object at trial. The defendant did not testify at trial. The Supreme Court held that the defendant's due process rights and the privilege against self-incrimination were violated by the prosecutor's comments and that the issue was reviewable under the common-law plain error doctrine. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded. St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P2d 1033, 53 St. Rep. 1282 (1996), distinguished in St. v. Baker, 2000 MT 307, 302 M 408, 15 P3d 379, 57 St. Rep. 1297 (2000).

Appeal From Failure to Grant Self-Defense Instruction — Failure to Object: Assault defendant who failed to object to or offer other instructions regarding the "no aggressor" rule contained in the court's self-defense instructions could not, on appeal, raise the issue of failure to instruct on exceptions to that rule. The issue would not be addressed under the common-law plain error rule because declining review did not rise to the level of a manifest miscarriage of justice, did not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial, and did not compromise the integrity of the judicial process. St. v. Gonzales, 278 M 525, 926 P2d 705, 53 St. Rep. 1015 (1996).

Sexual Abuse — Failure of District Court to Consider Sentencing Alternatives — No Objection — Sentence Not Illegal or Violation of Due Process: Swoboda pleaded guilty to sexual abuse of children, was classified as a nondangerous offender, and was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections. On appeal, she claimed as error the District Court's failure to consider alternatives to incarceration. The Supreme Court noted that she had not objected at sentencing to the District Court's failure and declined to review the judgment. The Supreme Court noted that in the past, it had made an exception and reviewed such a failure of the District Court when the state conceded the failure of the District Court or when the sentence was illegal. Here, however, the Supreme Court noted that the sentence was not beyond the District Court's jurisdiction. Citing St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), the Supreme Court also held that the failure of the District Court was not a manifest miscarriage of justice and would not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial or the proceedings. St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996).

Common-Law Plain Error: Despite the clear language of 1-1-108 precluding application of the common law in cases in which the law is declared by statute, the doctrine of common-law plain error review by the Montana Supreme Court continues to exist to allow correction of errors not objected to at trial but that affect the fairness, integrity, and public reputation of judicial proceedings. The doctrine continues in spite of the passage of this section, Montana's plain error statute restricting the review of errors not objected to at trial. Although failing to address the applicability of 1-1-108, the Supreme Court nevertheless retained the inherent power and obligation to interpret the constitution, protect individual rights, prevent manifest injustice, and correspondingly review lower court decisions and actions for error on a selective case-by-case basis, as inherent in the appellate process, despite the statutory restrictions and legislative intent of this section. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), contrasted in St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996), and followed in St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999), St. v. Pizzichiello, 1999 MT 123, 294 M 436, 983 P2d 888, 56 St. Rep. 499 (1999), and St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299, 56 St. Rep. 891 (1999). See also Seyferth v. St., 277 M 377, 922 P2d 494, 53 St. Rep. 698 (1996).

Common-Law Plain Error — Case-by-Case Review: Despite the passage of this section, Montana's plain error statute restricting the review of errors not objected to at trial, the doctrine of common-law plain error review by the Montana Supreme Court continues to exist to allow correction of errors not objected to at trial but that affect the fairness, integrity, and public reputation of judicial proceedings. The Supreme Court retains the inherent power and obligation to interpret the constitution, protect individual rights, prevent manifest injustice, and correspondingly review lower court decisions and actions for error. The power of such review is inherent in the appellate process itself. Thus, while acknowledging the constraints of this section, the Supreme Court will discretionarily review claimed errors that implicate a criminal defendant's fundamental constitutional rights even if no contemporaneous objection is made and notwithstanding the statutory criteria, in the class of cases when failure to conduct the review may result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of trial proceedings, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. The doctrine will be applied sparingly and on a case-by-case basis. Nevertheless, the necessity for contemporaneous objection to claimed error remains because this section will be applied, except in the class of cases mentioned above. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), followed in St. v. Monaco, 277 M 221, 921 P2d 863, 53 St. Rep. 604 (1996), St. v. Weaver, 1998 MT 167, 290 M 58, 964 P2d 713, 55 St. Rep. 668 (1998), St. v. Herrera, 1998 MT 173, 289 M 499, 962 P2d 1180, 55 St. Rep. 703 (1998), in which the Supreme Court refused to apply the plain error doctrine, St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999), St. v. Pizzichiello, 1999 MT 123, 294 M 436, 983 P2d 888, 56 St. Rep. 499 (1999), St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299, 56 St. Rep. 891 (1999), Columbus v. Harrington, 2001 MT 258, 307 M 215, 36 P3d 937 (2001), *St. v. Improper Comments by Prospective Jurors During Voir Dire — Prejudicial Effect Warranting Reversal: Comments made in the presence of the entire jury panel indicating that certain potential jurors not only knew the defendant but also were aware of the defendant's high propensity for violence were prejudicial, thereby poisoning the perspective of the entire jury panel in such a way that the court could not rectify the problem through admonishment or curative jury instructions and constituting reversible error. This opinion was narrowly drawn and reserved only for the most egregious and prejudicial juror comments—comments that indicate a bias that the juror cannot lay aside or comments that, when made in the presence of other prospective jurors, amount to inadmissible opinions about the defendant's character or propensities. The Supreme Court suggested that District Courts advise prospective jurors, before voir dire commences, not to volunteer the substance of any comments or opinions that they may have about the parties but rather to notify the court that they have information or an opinion about a party. The trial judge can then explore the substance of that information in camera and avoid any taint to the entire jury panel. St. v. McMahon, 271 M 75, 894 P2d 313, 52 St. Rep. 353 (1995), following principles established in Putro v. Baker, 147 M 139, 410 P2d 717 (1966), and followed in St. v. Hardaway, 1998 MT 224, 290 M 516, 966 P2d 125, 55 St. Rep. 936 (1998).

Prosecution Comment on Sexual Abuse in Opening Statement — Door Not Opened — Testimony Properly Excluded Under Rape Shield Law: Stuit was charged with sexual abuse of S.M., a minor. At trial, the District Court cautioned both the defense and prosecution that testimony concerning prior acts of abuse of S.M. would not be admitted. However, in an opening statement, the prosecution made reference to past sexual abuse of S.M. No objection was made by the defense at the time. Later, in a conference in chambers, the District Court noted that the statement came close to opening the door on the issue of past abuse, but ultimately ruled that the door had not been opened on the issue. The Supreme Court held that failure of defense counsel to make a contemporaneous objection waived the issue and that the doctrine of plain error did not apply under the statute. The Supreme Court also held that any evidence of prior abuse was inadmissible under the rape shield law. St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290, 51 St. Rep. 1238 (1994).

Limited Applicability of Plain Error Doctrine: Arlington contended that the prosecutor suppressed a victim's claim form, filed by the victim with the Department of Justice crime victims unit in order to obtain benefits, and that the suppression constituted plain error for which a new trial was warranted. Notwithstanding the fact that the issue was not raised at trial, the Supreme Court noted the limited applicability of the plain error doctrine, which exists to prevent manifest injustice by providing a remedy when a party's substantial rights have been infringed. The doctrine will be invoked only when necessary to ensure a fair and impartial trial. In this case, there was nothing in the claim form that was even remotely exculpatory as regards the criminal charges filed against Arlington or that would assist in his defense. Given that the claim form was a public document available to Arlington for the asking and that Arlington did not preserve a claim of error by including it in the record once it was obtained, there was no evidence of prosecutorial misconduct or prejudice, much less plain error. St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Petition to Revoke Filed After Period of Suspension — Question of Jurisdiction Properly Raised and Sentence Voided: The County Attorney's office petitioned for revocation of Voegelé's suspended sentence 2 days after the term of the suspended sentence had expired. While Voegelé rightfully asserted that allowing the tardy revocation petition was prejudicial to his punishment, he acknowledged that he was precluded from challenging the District Court's jurisdiction under subsection (2) of this section. However, the Supreme Court found that until Voegelé obtained new counsel on appeal, no one was aware that the suspended sentence had expired. Under the plain error doctrine, the power of discretionary review was applied to address the arithmetic jurisdictional error and prevent manifest injustice. Voegelé was therefore not barred from raising the jurisdictional issue, and the Supreme Court held that the imposition of sentence was void for lack of jurisdiction because the petition to revoke the suspended sentence was filed after the sentence had expired. St. v. Voegelé, 243 M 222, 793 P2d 832, 47 St. Rep. 1183 (1990), following St. v. Wilkins, 229 M 78, 746 P2d 588 (1987). See also St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Use of Expert Testimony to Identify Victim of Sexual Abuse — Not Plain Error: Defendant argued that even though no objection was made at trial, the admission of expert testimony indicating a child had been sexually abused was improper because it was not scientifically reliable and constituted plain error. However, defendant presented no evidence that the testimony was prejudicial as to his guilt or innocence or that the alleged error met any of the criteria of subsection (2) of this section. Further, when expert testimony in child abuse cases has not been objected to at trial as improper, the Supreme Court will not entertain the issue on appeal. St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111, 47 St. Rep. 1143 (1990), following St. v. Eiler, 234 M 38, 762 P2d 210 (1988).

Anonymous Tip — Hearsay — Plain Error: In the prosecution of defendant for conspiracy to commit arson and attempted criminal mischief, admission of the contents of an anonymous tip was error as the tip was hearsay. However, because defendant did not object to admission of the tip at trial, the inquiry of whether admission constituted reversible error extends only to determining whether the admission was plain error affecting substantial rights of the defendant under Rule 103, M.R.Ev. St. v. Cain, 220 M 509, 717 P2d 15, 43 St. Rep. 568 (1986).

Violation of Order Granting Motion In Limine: The "plain error" rule does not apply when only nonsubstantial rights of appellant are affected by testimony entered in violation of a motion in limine. St. v. Lias, 218 M 124, 706 P2d 500, 42 St. Rep. 1453 (1985).

Standard Self-Defense Instruction Given — Second Instruction Tailored to Facts Improper: In aggravated assault trial, the 9th instruction fully set forth the elements of self-defense and the 10th instruction related to self-defense by one assaulted with fists, as defendant claimed he had been. The 10th instruction was repetitious and may have placed undue emphasis on the requirements for self-defense. On remand following reversal on another issue, the court recommended that the repetitious instruction not be given. St. v. White, 202 M 491, 658 P2d 1111, 40 St. Rep. 235 (1983).

Instructions — Elements of Crime — Plain Error Not to Instruct: The jury was not instructed on the statutory elements of the crime. The jury's instructions on the defendant's civil remedy, an agister's lien, permitted the inference, from his failure to pursue the civil remedy, that he was guilty of theft. In granting a new trial, the Supreme Court noted that the issue of jury instructions not offered or objected to at trial, usually a nonappealable issue, was reviewed here to determine if the jury was properly instructed. The failure to instruct on the elements of the crime constituted "plain error". Instructing the jury that each element of the crime had to be proved was insufficient if the elements were not given to the jury as well. St. v. Lundblade, 191 M 526, 625 P2d 545, 38 St. Rep. 441 (1981), distinguished in St. v. Williams, 2015 MT 247, 380 Mont. 445, 358 P.3d 127. However, in St. v. Smith, 228 M 258, 742 P2d 451, 44 St. Rep. 1503 (1987), the Supreme Court noted that due to the 1983 amendment of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987), Lundblade is no longer authority under the theory of plain error not to instruct on elements of a crime.

NO ERROR FOUND

No Error, Let Alone Cumulative Error — Cumulative Error Doctrine Requires Numerous Errors: When individual errors would be insufficient alone to serve as a basis for reversal, the sum of those errors can nevertheless serve as a basis for reversal under the cumulative error doctrine. The cumulative error doctrine requires reversal when numerous errors, when taken together, have prejudiced a defendant's right to a fair trial. The District Court correctly denied the defendant's motion for directed verdict, properly exercised its discretion in refusing the mere presence jury instruction, and properly ruled his two traveling companions' inconsistent statements about an acquaintance did not constitute hearsay. Consequently, there was no cumulative error by the District Court or resulting prejudice to the defendant's right to a fair trial. St. v. Ellerbee, 2019 MT 37, 394 Mont. 289, 434 P.3d 910, following St. v. Cunningham, 2018 MT 56, 390 Mont. 408, 414 P.3d 289.

Any Defect Cured — No Mistrial: During a homicide trial, the judge grew dissatisfied with the pace of the trial and admonished counsel before retiring for the day. Hixon moved for a mistrial asserting that the judge's comments on "wasting time" deprived him of his right to a fair trial. Hixon contended that the judge's assertion that his statements were directed toward the state and his general apology the next day did not rectify the wrong done. Outside the presence of the jury the judge explained to counsel that his comments were directed towards the prosecution, given that the state had moved at an extremely slow pace. The next day the judge apologized to the jury for his comments and instructed the jury that no comment he made was intended in any way to express his opinion about the facts of the case or the verdict they should reach. The Supreme Court held that where the trial judge strikes improper statements from the record with an accompanying cautionary instruction to the jury, any error committed is presumed cured. There was no indication that Hixon was prejudiced by the judge's statements. St. v. Hixon, 2008 MT 365, 346 M 427, 197 P3d 918 (2008).

Prosecutor's Inaccurate Description of DNA Evidence — Curative Jury Instruction — No Error Requiring New Trial: Defendant contended that a new trial was warranted because the prosecutor inaccurately stated that the victim's and defendant's DNA were found together at the scene of an alleged sexual assault. The trial court agreed that the evidence was mischaracterized and gave a curative instruction that the jury was to disregard any statement that mixed DNA was found and denied defendant's motion for a new trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed on this point. Given the curative instruction, defendant did not demonstrate that the trial court acted arbitrarily without conscientious judgment or exceeded the bounds of reason in denying the new trial motion. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Statute Prohibiting Impeding Traffic Not Vague or Fundamentally Unfair: Benders argued that 61-8-311, which prohibits driving in a manner that impedes traffic, is unconstitutionally vague and fundamentally unfair. The Supreme Court held that none of the circumstances of Benders' case were applicable to the constitutional claim, but considered whether the claim warranted review under the plain error doctrine on the issue of unfairness. The fairness issue was based on the assertion that it was unfair to convict Benders of impeding traffic when there was no finding that Benders had violated a minimum speed limit. However, the relevant determination under 61-8-311 is not the speed of the vehicle, but the effect of the slow speed on the flow of traffic. Therefore, Benders failed to demonstrate that the statutory language was vague, much less that it amounted to a fundamental unfairness resulting in plain error. The challenge to the constitutionality of 61-8-311 failed. St. v. Benders, 2006 MT 275, 334 M 231, 146 P3d 751 (2006).

Definition of Sexual Contact Allowing Two Means of Satisfying Mental State, Not Two Separate Offenses: Following trial for sexual assault, Clark asserted that the District Court erred in failing to instruct the jury that it was required to unanimously find that Clark had subjected his stepdaughter to sexual contact for purposes of either 45-2-101(67)(a) or (67)(b) and that failure to do so should be reviewed under the plain error doctrine. The Supreme Court held that the definition allows for two means of satisfying the purposely or knowingly element of sexual contact, rather than articulating two separate offenses. Therefore, the District Court did not err in instructing the jury as to any unanimity required regarding the elements of sexual contact, and the Supreme Court declined to implement the plain error doctrine to discuss the issue. St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1 (1995), and St. v. Weaver, 1998 MT 167, 290 M 58, 964 P2d 713 (1998).

Prosecutor's Closing Statement Considered in Context — Burden of Proof Not Shifted: In closing argument, the prosecutor told the jury that this was a case in which the jury had to decide between two conflicting stories, rather than a case in which a defendant chose to remain silent and the jury had to decide whether the prosecution met its burden of proof. Defense counsel immediately objected based on the prosecutor's implication that the state did not have to prove the elements of the crime. The prosecutor then reiterated that the state did have the burden of proving the elements of the crime. Taken in context, the closing statement did not impermissibly shift the burden of proof and deny defendant a fair trial, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Roubideaux, 2005 MT 324, 329 M 521, 125 P3d 1114 (2005), following St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21 (1981), and followed in St. v. Kolb, 2009 MT 9, 349 M 10, 200 P3d 504 (2009).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

No Prejudice Warranting New Trial on Grounds of Cumulative Error: Larson contended that he was denied a fair trial and was entitled to a new trial because of the cumulative errors argued in his appeal. The doctrine of cumulative error requires reversal of a conviction when a number of errors taken together prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial. However, in this case, the Supreme Court declined to apply the doctrine after reviewing all the issues on appeal. There was no prejudice shown, there was no abuse of judicial discretion, none of the evidentiary rulings were erroneous, and there was sufficient evidence to support the conviction. Larson's mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice were insufficient to satisfy the doctrine, and Larson's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Larson, 2004 MT 345, 324 M 310, 103 P3d 524 (2004).

No Prejudice in Change of Venue: The trial court granted Bar-Jonah's motion for a change of venue from Great Falls to Butte. Even though the venue change was requested by Bar-Jonah, following conviction, he asserted that pretrial publicity in Butte precluded a fair trial. The Supreme Court found that Bar-Jonah failed to demonstrate prejudice by the decision to hold the trial in Butte and declined to reverse the judgment absent a showing that any error in changing the venue was prejudicial. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Jury Instruction Disallowing Evidence of Intoxication in Determining State of Mind Not Error — Full and Fair Instructions on Law: Following Raugust's criminal trial, the court instructed the jury that it could not consider evidence of intoxication for any purpose, pursuant to 45-2-203. Raugust maintained on appeal that the instruction was in error because depriving him of the ability to admit intoxication evidence lessened the state's burden of proof and confused the jury, in violation of his due process rights. However, the error urged on appeal was not contained in the objection made to the instruction during the final settling of jury instructions, constituting waiver of the argument on appeal. Moreover, the plain error doctrine did not apply because review under that doctrine was requested for the first time on appeal. Here, the jury was instructed regarding: (1) the elements of each offense charged and the state's burden of proving each element beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) the definition of the applicable mental states—purposely and knowingly; (3) the fact that the existence of a mental state may be inferred from the acts of the accused and from the facts and circumstances connected with the offense; (4) the difference between direct and circumstantial evidence; (5) witness credibility; and (6) the need for a unanimous verdict. Read as a whole, these instructions fairly and fully instructed the jury on the law applicable to the case, and giving the instruction disallowing the defense of intoxication was not erroneous. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St. Rep. 570 (2000). See also St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994 (1997).

Evidence of Victim's Character and Prior Violent Act Inadmissible as Element of Self-Defense: Sattler claimed that his homicide of Martinson was in self-defense and sought to introduce evidence of a prior act of violence that was committed by Martinson 8 years before his death as proof of Martinson's aggressiveness and Sattler's need to use force in his defense. However, nothing in 45-3-102 relates directly to the question of the identity of the aggressor as an essential element of the justifiable use of force defense. Further, evidence of the prior act did not support any claim that the force used against Martinson was reasonable based on Sattler's knowledge of Martinson's history of violence. Also, the act was remote in time, and the lapse of time between the prior act and Martinson's death rendered the probity of the act minimal at best. Refusing to admit the evidence would not have resulted in prejudicial and reversible error or affected Sattler's substantial rights in light of the other evidence of record. Thus, reversal was not warranted. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998), distinguished in Red Lodge v. Nelson, 1999 MT 246, 296 M 190, 989 P2d 300, 56 St. Rep. 955 (1999). See also St. v. Benton, 251 M 401, 825 P2d 565 (1992).

In St. v. Branham, 2012 MT 1, 363 Mont. 281, 269 P.3d 891, the defendant asserted the defense of justifiable use of force and argued that evidence of the victim's character that was unknown to the defendant when he committed the offense was admissible to show that the victim was the aggressor. The Supreme Court concluded that evidence of the victim's character was limited to facts known to the defendant at the time he committed the offense and overruled St. v. Harville, 2006 MT 292, 334 Mont. 380, 147 P.3d 22, St. v. Russell, 2001 MT 278, 307 Mont. 322, 37 P.3d 678, and St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 Mont. 79, 956 P.2d 54, to the extent that those cases held that the identity of the aggressor is an essential element of the defense of justifiable use of force.

Judge's Questions About Foreigner's Immigration Status as Showing Racial Bias: The District Court erred in asking Ahmed, a resident and native of Bangladesh and a student at MSU-Bozeman, about his immigration status in a trial for aggravated kidnapping and assault but cured the error by sustaining an objection and striking the questioning from the record. Ahmed offered no specific evidence that the questioning showed racial bias by the judge, and the Supreme Court would not presume bias from the mere posing of the questions. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Racial Bias of Judge Who Illegally Made Deportation Condition of Parole Not Shown by Mere Unsupported Speculation: Upon an aggravated kidnapping and assault conviction of a native of Bangladesh, the court ordered deportation as a condition of parole. This was an illegal condition but did not alone show the judge was racially biased against defendant. A claim of bias was not upheld when it was supported by mere speculation or conjecture by defendant. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Impeachment of Verdict With Juror Testimony That .357 Magnum Handgun Cannot Be Rapidly Fired — Defense Claim That Victim Shot Himself: The trial court properly refused to allow defendant to impeach the verdict with juror testimony that one juror told the others that he knew that a .357 magnum handgun could not be fired rapidly. Defendant argued that this allowed the jury to conclude that defendant's theory that the victim shot himself was inherently incredible. Rule 606, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), does not allow inquiry into the internal mechanisms of a jury's decisionmaking process. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Judge's Failure to Inform Defense of Juror Contact With Defendant: It was not error for the judge to fail to immediately notify the defense counsel after the bailiff told the judge that a juror had told the bailiff that, during the trial, she served defendant coffee at a cafe in which she was a waitress. Defendant was given a hearing on the matter after trial and could not show prejudice. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Waitress-Juror's Statements to Jury That She Served Defendant and Report of Dream — Not Juror Misconduct: There was no juror misconduct or prejudice to defendant when a juror told other jurors that she twice served defendant as a waitress during the trial, that he made her uncomfortable, and that she had a dream in which they found defendant guilty and in which he had a gun and shot his counsel, grabbed her, and ran off with her. Therefore, a new trial was properly denied. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Failure to Object — No Plain Error in Admitting Mug Shot in Evidence: Absent proof that his substantial rights were prejudiced, appellant who did not object during the trial was not entitled to review of introduction into evidence of his mug shot, which he claimed indicated to the jury that he had a past criminal record. Even under the plain error doctrine, which provides a remedy to prevent manifest injustice when objection was not made below, reversal was not warranted. A mug shot is generally admissible, at the discretion of the judge, if disguised, as it was here, to remove law enforcement information. Appellant could not prove prejudice because eyewitnesses to the theft could not absolutely identify defendant from the mug shot, his own testimony showed that he in fact had a past criminal record, and his defense was that he was not the person who committed the theft. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

No Prejudice in Permitting Jury to Hear Discussion on Evidence Later Held Inadmissible: Defendant contended he was highly prejudiced when the trial court allowed the jury to hear discussion on admissibility of a transcript of a tape recording and on a motion to dismiss, pointing out that no jury instruction was given regarding the problem. The Supreme Court, noting that the transcript was not admitted into evidence, found no reason to believe that the jury would understand that it could consider material not in evidence. An instruction would only have told the jury to disregard what it had not seen; therefore, there was no prejudice in the jury's witnessing of the exchange regarding the transcript. St. v. Moreno, 248 M 91, 809 P2d 574, 48 St. Rep. 339 (1991).

Disallowance of Cumulative Character Evidence Not Reversible Error — Offer of Proof: Defendant was not allowed to impeach a witness directly through introduction of character evidence. Defendant was allowed to make an offer of proof, but he made no statement as to what facts were to be proved or that an alternative manner would be less objectionable. The evidence defendant attempted to present was cumulative in that it came out in various forms, directly and indirectly, throughout the trial after the witness testified. The exclusion of the character evidence affected no substantial right and was not reversible error. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Evidence Overwhelming to Sustain Mitigated Deliberate Homicide Conviction: On appeal of his conviction of mitigated deliberate homicide, defendant claimed that the shooting that was the basis of his conviction was accidental. The Supreme Court affirmed the conviction, ruling that the evidence was overwhelming that the shooting was not an accident since all of the witnesses except defendant and his wife testified that defendant had the gun in both hands, arms extended. The gun was pointed toward the decedent immediately after the shot was fired. St. v. Sage, 221 M 192, 717 P2d 1096, 43 St. Rep. 738 (1986).

Mere Allegations of Prejudice Insufficient to Satisfy Cumulative Error Doctrine: Defendant contended that the overall demeanor of the prosecution and the District Court, together with other alleged errors, required a reversal of his conviction; however, he articulated no particular comments or remarks and alleged no prejudice to his substantial rights. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the cumulative error doctrine, which is the accumulation of errors which prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial, but noted that mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice are insufficient to satisfy the doctrine. The resolution of the alleged errors indicated no error meriting reversal of this case, and the court held that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing prejudice and declined to reverse his conviction on grounds of cumulative error. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005), St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005), St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007), and St. v. Hatfield, 2018 MT 229, 392 Mont. 509, 426 P.3d 569.

Robbery With Gun Apparently Under Coat — Sentence of Thirty Years Permissible: Defendant claimed that his 30-year sentence for robbery of a convenience store was disproportionate to the facts (which included a finding that he had his hand under his coat and the store clerk believed he had a gun). The sentence was within the permissible statutory range, there was no clear abuse of discretion, and the sentence was properly reviewable in the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court. St. v. Lewis, 220 M 418, 715 P2d 1064, 43 St. Rep. 492 (1986), following St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

Failure to Object to Jury Instruction — No Show of Prejudice — No Reversible Error: Appellant failed to object at the time the court informed the parties that it would not give the omnibus instruction or reread the preliminary jury instructions and would instead send the preliminary instruction with the final instructions to the jury. Because of the failure to make a timely objection and failure upon appeal to show any prejudice affecting substantial rights, there was no reversible error. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986). See also St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Six and a Half Weeks to Prepare for Burglary-Theft Trial — Sufficient Time: There was nothing to indicate that, when counsel for defendant convicted of two counts of burglary and one of theft had 6½ weeks to prepare for trial, the attorney had insufficient time to adequately prepare and nothing to indicate that effective assistance of counsel was denied. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985).

Prosecutorial Discretion — Deputy's Prior Representation: The Lemmons were divorced after 20 years of marriage. Leroy was seeing Donna Myers, and Koralyn was seeing John Sweeting. Myers and Sweeting had just ended a personal and business relationship. Sweeting asked Koralyn to get a briefcase out of Leroy's truck. The briefcase actually belonged to Myers. Leroy and Myers returned to the truck and found the briefcase missing. They concluded Koralyn had taken it since the truck was not broken into. Leroy and Myers went to Koralyn's home. She heard them drive up and put a gun in the waistband of her pants. Leroy and Koralyn fought, and Leroy struck her in the head with the gun. Leroy and Myers put Koralyn on the floor of the truck and went to the Sheriff's department. The Sheriff was not immediately available, so Leroy and Myers left, with Koralyn still on the floor of the truck, to find Sweeting. A high speed chase ensued in which the cars rammed together and gunshots were exchanged. The chase ended when Leroy's transmission caught fire. The charges arising from the pursuit were dropped. Leroy was charged with aggravated assault and kidnapping. He was convicted of assault and unlawful restraint. Leroy contended the County Attorney abused his discretion in not acting on his complaints against Koralyn and for not disqualifying the office since a deputy had represented Koralyn in the divorce. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the abuse of discretion issue had not been raised at trial and could not be raised on appeal. The court also stated that selectivity in enforcement is not a violation of the U. S. Constitution if the selection is not based on an unjustifiable or arbitrary classification. The court construed DR 5-105(D) to concern conflicts in representation, not prosecution. Also, the court stated that it was not established that the County Attorney would have been disqualified from the prosecution for representing Koralyn, let alone a deputy. St. v. Lemmon, 214 M 121, 692 P2d 455, 41 St. Rep. 2359 (1984), followed, with regard to the broad applicability of prosecutorial discretion, in St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999).

Criminal Mischief for Damage to One's Own Property to Defraud Insurer — Relevance of Pictures of Property: Defendant was charged with criminal mischief in that he purposely drove his pickup over a steep bank to wreck it so he could collect from his insurance company. Later the pickup was vandalized. Pictures of the pickup taken after the vandalism were properly admitted as proof of defendant's motive, and their probative value was substantial and was not outweighed by prejudice to defendant, who claimed that they should not have been admitted because they were evidence of other crimes as well as the one with which he was charged and that he had not been charged with vandalism. St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262, 40 St. Rep. 2023 (1983).

Issue Created by Complainant's Counsel: Defendant convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide could not successfully claim prejudicial error occurred when the issue of his failure to obtain a concealed weapon permit arose, for the issue was created by his own counsel during opening argument. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Discretion of Court — Different Sentences for Co-Offenders: On appellate review, undermining the legality of a sentence requires a showing that the judge abused his discretion in the sentencing process. There was no abuse of discretion where defendant and another were separately convicted of the same burglary, the other person was offered and accepted a bargain for a 3-year deferred sentence, and defendant was offered a bargain for a 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended, refused it, and was tried, convicted, and sentenced to 10 years. There was a strong possibility that his alibi defense was frivolous, and he had a prior felony record. St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982).

Inquiry as to Time Served — Letter to Warden From Judge: Letter written by judge who revoked suspended sentence to warden of penitentiary, inquiring as to prison time to be credited against sentence, was not prejudicial. The evidence indicated the letter was written at defendant's instigation and that defendant complimented the judge on judge's efforts in defendant's behalf. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Failure to Object to Jury Instructions — Issue Precluded on Appeal: Where the defendant was convicted of felony murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery and either failed to object at trial to certain instructions to the jury or concurred in those instructions, the Supreme Court found the defendant was precluded from raising alleged errors in those instructions for the first time on appeal. The Supreme Court also found that the objections had no merit as the instructions objected to, or instructions substantially similar to them, had been approved in St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979). St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

Instruction That Rape Easily Charged and Difficult to Prove Allowable: Where the record showed evidence corroborating the victim's testimony and no evidence of any desire for revenge, the District Court did not err in not giving the following instruction: "You are instructed that no charge can be more easily made and none is more difficult to disprove than that of rape. The jury is instructed that they must examine the complainant's testimony with caution and be satisfied with all aspects thereof beyond a reasonable doubt." St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Sexual Assault — Resistance — Proper Instruction: In a sexual intercourse without consent case, the jury was instructed that the victim need only resist to the extent that is reasonable and that continued resistance is not necessary to show that the act was done without consent. That was a correct statement of the law, and the District Court properly refused defendant's proposed instructions. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Prosecutor's Remarks on Lack of Defense Case Held Permissible: The defendant appealed his conviction for theft and alleged that the prosecution's closing statement included impermissible remarks. The County Attorney's comments in part referred to the fact that the defense presented no case at all. Certainly the prosecution, as an adversary for the state, cannot be prohibited from arguing the strength of its case to the jury. The manifest fact that the defense presented no testimony of its own may be detrimental to the defendant, but that fact cannot deny the prosecution its right to stress the strength of its own evidence. St. v. Dolan, 190 M 195, 620 P2d 355, 37 St. Rep. 1860 (1980).

Suppression of Confession — Voluntariness — Waiver of Right to Counsel After Making Request: To determine whether a confession should have been suppressed, it had to be determined whether the confession was voluntary and whether there was an unconstitutional denial of the right to counsel. In so doing, the following questions had to be answered: What was the totality of the circumstances? Was there effective assertion of the right to counsel, and if so, was there an effective waiver later? Since the evidence answered a large number of the requisite questions about the circumstances, the decision of the trial court was held not to have clearly contravened the weight of the evidence and its holding of voluntariness was upheld. Since any indication by a defendant in any manner that he wishes to consult with an attorney suffices, and evidence showed the defendant had met this requirement, the trial court erred in concluding that there was ineffective assertion of the right to counsel. After adopting the rule that a defendant can validly waive the right to counsel after making a request for counsel, the Supreme Court found the trial court properly found that the State had carried its "heavy burden" of showing waiver of counsel. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979); certiorari granted in Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981); affirmed on remand in St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Voluntariness of Confession — Burdens of Proof — Harmless Error: A trial judge can properly require a party moving for suppression of evidence (involuntary confession) to initiate suppression hearing proceedings. The rationale for such a procedure is the requirement that the movant establish a prima facie case that a constitutional infringement has occurred. Once this has been accomplished, the ultimate burden of proving the propriety of the State's action (obtaining a confession) shifts to the State, notwithstanding 46-13-301(4), which is unconstitutional in that it requires defendant to prove that a confession or admission was involuntary. Thus, the District Court did not err in requiring appellant to present his evidence first at the suppression hearing but did err in putting the ultimate burden on the defendant at the hearing. The Supreme Court, however, upheld the District Court's denial of the motion to suppress because its error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979). [Annotator's Note: A 1981 amendment requires the state to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the confession or admission was voluntary. Certiorari was granted in Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and the judgment vacated and the case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981). The court affirmed its original decision on remand, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).]

Motion to Suppress Not Timely — Waiver: The defendant's failure to make a timely motion to suppress evidence waived the search and seizure issue for appeal, notwithstanding his objection to the introduction of the evidence seized. St. v. Gallagher, 162 M 155, 509 P2d 852 (1973).

Absence of Prospective Juror: The failure of a properly notified juror to be present when the jury was impaneled did not invalidate the trial as the defendant had the right only to reject jurors and not to select any particular juror. St. v. Moran, 142 M 423, 384 P2d 777 (1963).

Waiver of Error — Approval of Instructions on Subject: Objection to references by the County Attorney as to the nature of the trial, an appeal from Justice's Court, claimed as prejudicial error in the District Court, was waived by counsel for the defendant when he approved instructions to be given by the District Court which included reference to Justice's Court proceedings and thereafter obtained a deletion from the instructions of the phrase which read "and was found guilty following a jury trial". St. v. Gilbert, 139 M 204, 362 P2d 221 (1961).

Objection That Facts Do Not Constitute an Offense — When Taken: Under former law, the objection that the facts stated in an information do not constitute a public offense could be taken by demurrer, at the trial under a plea of not guilty, or after the trial in arrest of judgment. St. v. Smith, 58 M 567, 194 P 131 (1920).

Verdict Contrary to Law or Evidence: An alleged error in an instruction will not be reviewed on appeal when the only ground designated is that the verdict is contrary to the law and evidence. St. v. Gawith, 19 M 48, 47 P 207 (1896), overruled in St. v. Mason, 24 M 340, 61 P 861 (1900).

HARMLESS ERROR

Constitutional Right to Confrontation Violated by Allowing Foundational Witness to Testify in Real Time by Two-Way Videoconference — Harmless Error: The defendant appealed his convictions of deliberate homicide and tampering with physical evidence, arguing that he was denied his right under the United States Constitution and the Montana Constitution to confront witnesses against him when the District Court allowed a foundational witness to testify in real time by two-way videoconference. The Supreme Court determined that the two-prong analysis set forth in Md. v. Craig, 497 US 836 (1990), applied, requiring (1) a showing that the denial of face-to-face confrontation is necessary to further an important public policy, and (2) a determination by the trial court that reliability of the testimony is otherwise assured. Applying the first prong of Craig, the Supreme Court concluded that the use of two-way videoconference for the foundational witness's testimony was not necessary to further an important public policy because judicial economy, standing alone, did not constitute an important public policy. The Supreme Court upheld the defendant's conviction for deliberate homicide, concluding that the state demonstrated that the confrontation clause violation was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The Supreme Court reversed the defendant's conviction for tampering with physical evidence because the state offered no physical evidence or testimony, other than the erroneously admitted foundational witness's testimony, that proved the defendant handled the victim's phone or otherwise tampered with the phone. St. v. Mercier, 2021 MT 12, 403 Mont. 34, 479 P.3d 967, followed in St. v. Martell, 2021 MT 318, 406 Mont. 488, 500 P.3d 1233.

Rule Applicable to Criminal Proceedings — Harmless Error: Although the District Court erroneously ruled that Rule 611, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), did not apply to a criminal proceeding, Skype testimony presented by the prosecution in a cruelty to animals case did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant because the witness was in the live presence of the parties and subject to examination. Missoula v. Duane, 2015 MT 232, 380 Mont. 290, 355 P.3d 729, distinguished in St. v. Mercier, 2021 MT 12, 403 Mont. 34, 479 P.3d 967.

Limitation of Defense Expert Testimony During Trial Harmless Error: During a trial for vehicular homicide while under the influence, the District Court sustained an objection by the prosecution and prevented the defendant's expert forensic pathologist from testifying about muscle tearing on the victim's calves on the basis that the expert's report mentioned only bruising. The Supreme Court ruled that the District Court erred by limiting the defense expert's testimony since the report was properly disclosed as required by 46-15-323 and mentioned an opposing expert's finding regarding muscle tearing. However, the District Court's error was harmless since the expert witness was allowed to present the most critical aspects of his testimony to the jury, including his ultimate conclusion that the defendant's vehicle did not cause the victim's injuries. St. v. Garding, 2013 MT 355, 373 Mont. 16, 315 P.3d 912.

General Testimony on Impairment — Expert Marijuana Testimony by Nonexperts Harmless: Deputies testified as experts on how marijuana impairs driving ability in a DUI trial, but their training and experience were insufficient to qualify them as experts. The error was held to be harmless because the deputies' nonexpert testimony provided sufficient observations of the driver's general impairment, the testimony of the driver and the driver's performance on the field sobriety tests indicated impairment, and the defense on cross-examination demonstrated to the jury that neither deputy was an expert regarding marijuana's impact on the ability to drive. St. v. Larson, 2010 MT 236, 358 Mont. 156, 243 P.3d 1130.

Defendant Excluded from Hearing — Harmless Error Analysis — Matt Clarified and Overruled to Limited Extent: After having been excluded from a quickly called telephonic hearing before the District Court at which videotape evidence was discussed, Charlie argued on appeal that because the exclusion occurred at a critical stage of the proceedings, about 1 week before trial, his fundamental right to be present was violated and his conviction should be overturned. The Supreme Court held, based upon U.S. Supreme Court precedent, that although a harmless error analysis should be applied, Charlie's conviction should be overturned only if there was a "reasonable possibility" that he was prejudiced by the exclusion. To the extent that St. v. Matt, 2008 MT 444, 347 Mont. 530, 199 P.3d 244, imposed a presumption of prejudice when the defendant is excluded from a critical stage of the proceedings and imposed a burden of proof on the state, the Supreme Court overruled Matt but held that in Charlie's case the exclusion was harmless error because there was no reasonable possibility that Charlie was prejudiced by the exclusion. St. v. Charlie, 2010 MT 195, 357 Mont. 355, 239 P.3d 934.

Harmless Error for Detective Nonexpert to Testify Regarding Genuineness of Handwriting: The District Court allowed a detective to testify in Dewitz's trial regarding handwriting samples that the detective believed were from Dewitz. However, the detective was not a handwriting expert and was not familiar with Dewitz's writing outside the litigation, so the testimony was improperly admitted. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court concluded that the error was harmless, based on the existence of other admissible evidence that proved the same facts. Thus, Dewitz's right to a fair trial was not prejudiced. St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009).

Failure of State to Disclose Findings of Forensics Expert in Homicide Trial — Harmless Error: Morrissey retained a forensics expert to testify during Morrissey's homicide trial. The state had a forensics expert as well, and Morrissey moved for disclosure of the state's expert's findings. The state declined to disclose the findings on grounds that its expert would not be called as a witness during the state's case in chief, but only to rebut Morrissey's expert. The trial court denied Morrissey's discovery motion. Following trial, Morrissey appealed on grounds that the state violated 46-15-322 by failing to disclose its expert's conclusions. The Supreme Court agreed that under 46-15-322(1)(c), the prosecution was required to disclose the written report of the state's expert who examined the evidence, regardless of whether the expert was a witness in the state's case in chief, and noted that by refusing the disclosure request, the prosecution bound itself not to call the expert as a witness. When the state subsequently called its expert to give an opinion on the evidence, that testimony was objectionable. However, Morrissey had the opportunity to cross-examine the state's expert at length, so any error in allowing the expert's testimony was not prejudicial and was considered harmless. The trial court was affirmed. St. v. Morrissey, 2009 MT 201, 351 M 144, 214 P3d 708 (2009).

Admission of Officer's Personal Observation Testimony Cumulative and Harmless: At Foston's trial for distribution of dangerous drugs, the trial court, pursuant to Rule 803, M.R.Ev., admitted testimony by an officer that conversations overheard between Foston and a confidential informant were consistent with drug transactions. Foston appealed on grounds that the testimony constituted plain error. The Supreme Court noted that the testimony was admissible under Rule 701, M.R.Ev., as a statement of the officer's personal observation. The court further found that even without the officer's testimony, there was ample evidence from which the jury could conclude that Foston was selling drugs, so the testimony was cumulative and harmless if it was error at all. St. v. Foston, 2009 MT 191, 351 M 85, 209 P3d 262 (2009), overruled, to the extent that it requires objection to warrantless recordings to be made at trial, by St. v. Reichmand, 2010 MT 228, 358 Mont. 68, 243 P.3d 423.

Defendant's Absence From In-Chambers Trial Conferences Not Considered Prejudicial — No New Trial Based on Lack of Fair Trial: At Price's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, Price was excluded from 11 in-chambers conferences. Price contended that his absence from the conferences violated his right to be present at all criminal proceedings against him and that he was therefore denied a fair trial. The Supreme Court assumed for purposes of analysis that the conferences constituted critical stages of the trial and that Price did not validly waive the right to be present at the conferences. Nevertheless, the court concluded that failure to include Price in the conferences at worst constituted trial error, rather than structural error that would require automatic reversal, so the court examined the record to determine whether Price was prejudiced and concluded that he was not. The record was not ambiguous as to what occurred at the conferences, and nothing that occurred at the conferences concerned or affected the framework within which Price's trial proceeded or necessarily rendered the trial fundamentally unfair. The one conference at which Price particularly contended that his presence should have been required was one in which a juror expressed concern regarding possible bias toward Price. However, Price's concern was irrelevant when the juror was removed from the jury. After review of the complete trial record, the court concluded that Price's absence from the conferences did not cause any conceivable prejudice depriving Price of a fair trial. Absent reversible error, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Price, 2009 MT 129, 350 M 272, 207 P3d 298 (2009). See also St. v. Kennedy, 2004 MT 53, 320 M 161, 85 P3d 1279 (2004), St. v. Mann, 2006 MT 160, 332 M 476, 139 P3d 159 (2006), and St. v. Matt, 2008 MT 444, 347 M 530, 199 P3d 244 (2008). Matt was clarified and overruled in St. v. Charlie, 2010 MT 195, 357 Mont. 355, 239 P.3d 934.

Error for District Court to Impose Parole Conditions for Felony DUI — Error Harmless Given That No Parole Available: The District Court sentenced Kampf to 13 months with the Department of Corrections for felony DUI, followed by a suspended term of 2 years with the Department. The court then attached 25 conditions on the sentence during any term of parole or probation. Kampf contended that the court was without authority to impose conditions on any time period when Kampf might be released on parole. Citing St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), the Supreme Court agreed. Other than in limited and expressly authorized instances, such as for sexual and violent offenders, sentencing courts do not have a residual or inherent authority to generally impose parole conditions. Felony DUI is not a sexual or violent offense, so the District Court had no authority to impose parole conditions. However, pursuant to 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10), the imposition or execution of the 13-month sentence for felony DUI may not be deferred or suspended and the offender is not eligible for parole, so even though Kampf's sentence containing parole conditions was illegal, the error was harmless because parole was unavailable. St. v. Kampf, 2008 MT 198, 344 M 69, 186 P3d 223 (2008).

Trial Error in Admitting Written Witness Statements Based on Failure to Show That Prior Statements Made Before Alleged Motive to Fabricate — Error Harmless: At McOmber's trial for felony solicitation to issue a bad check, the trial court admitted a written statement and a police interview transcript made by a testifying witness. Admission of the evidence as a prior consistent statement was error because the state failed to show that the statements were made before the witness's alleged motive to fabricate occurred. However, pursuant to the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), the error was trial error rather than structural error and was therefore subject to harmless error review. Upon review, the Supreme Court concluded that the state had demonstrated, qualitatively and in comparison with the witness's testimony, that there was no possibility that the erroneously admitted prior consistent statements contributed to McOmber's conviction, so the error was harmless, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. McOmber, 2007 MT 340, 340 M 262, 173 P3d 690 (2007). See also St. v. Oliver, 2022 MT 104, 408 Mont. 519, 510 P.3d 1218, and St. v. Pitkanen, 2022 MT 231, 410 Mont. 503, 520 P.3d 305.

Prosecutor's Closing Comments Improper but Not Egregious — Failure of Counsel to Object Not Ineffective Assistance: On appeal, defendant argued that the prosecutor's comments that the prosecutor did not put any stock in the defense theory was an impermissible expression of personal opinion about the defendant's credibility and that defense counsel erred by failing to object to the comments. The Supreme Court agreed that the comments were improper, but did not conclude that the comments rose to a level of egregiousness that prejudiced defendant or that rendered the trial unfair, so any error by defense counsel in failing to object was harmless. St. v. Tennell, 2007 MT 266, 339 M 381, 170 P3d 965 (2007).

Enhanced Sentence for Use of Weapon — Apprendi Applied Retroactively Under Harmless Error Test — Enhanced Sentence Without Unanimous Jury Finding Harmless Error: After Adams received an enhanced sentence for use of a weapon during an aggravated assault, Adams appealed on grounds that there was insufficient evidence to support a finding that a weapon was used and that the enhanced sentence violated due process because there was no separate jury finding that a weapon was used, as required by Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000). The 2001 Legislature updated the law to address the Apprendi requirement, but as it read in 1997 during Adams's sentencing, 46-1-401 did not require a separate jury finding, so Adams argued that 46-1-401 was therefore unconstitutional. The Supreme Court held that Apprendi imposes a new obligation on the state and is thus a new rule that applies retroactively to cases pending on direct appeal or not final at the time that the new rule was issued, so Apprendi applied retroactively to Adams's direct appeal. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence on both issues. First, there was uncontroverted evidence that a weapon was involved in the crime. Second, the Supreme Court applied Neder v. U.S., 527 US 1 (1999), to determine the proper test to apply when a trial court fails to instruct the jury to make a finding of materiality. Under Neder, the proper test is the harmless error test, i.e., whether it appears beyond a reasonable doubt that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained. Thus, in this case, the question was whether, beyond a reasonable doubt, Adams would have received an enhanced sentence based on the display or use of a weapon had the question been submitted to the jury. Given evidence that a gun was used was uncontroverted, the result would have been the same, so any error in failing to present the question to the jury was harmless. Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007), applying St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001).

Failure of Trial Court to Rule on Motion to Dismiss Not Violative of Due Process Rights — Plenary Review of Constitutional Question: Following a sentencing hearing, Smerker simultaneously filed notice of appeal to the Supreme Court and a motion to dismiss a felony DUI charge on grounds that two prior misdemeanor DUI violations were constitutionally invalid and could not be used to enhance the current charge to a felony. The sentencing court declined to rule on the motion to dismiss, which Smerker contended was a violation of due process rights. The Supreme Court disagreed. Smerker's arguments were based on documentary evidence related to the prior offenses, and the Supreme Court is in as good a position as a District Court to judge the weight of documentary evidence. Therefore, the Supreme Court exercised plenary review of the constitutional validity of the prior convictions. Because the Supreme Court could adequately address the issue, the District Court's failure to rule on the motion to dismiss did not affect Smerker's substantial due process rights. St. v. Smerker, 2006 MT 117, 332 M 221, 136 P3d 543 (2006).

Personal Possession of Pipe Insufficient Probable Cause to Search Vehicle — Evidence in Plain View in Vehicle Sufficient Probable Cause for Subsequent Search of Residence: When Griffin was lawfully arrested for driving without a license, the arresting officer found a pipe in Griffin's pocket that, in the officer's opinion, contained drug residue. The officer then obtained a search warrant for Griffin's truck. When approaching the truck, the officer observed items in plain view in the open truck bed that could be used to manufacture methamphetamine. Pursuant to another search warrant based on the evidence in the truck bed, officers searched Griffin's residence and found a drug lab that was booby-trapped with explosives. Griffin moved to suppress all the evidence because the first search warrant was issued without probable cause. The motion was denied, but on appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the only evidence supporting the vehicle search warrant—the existence of a pipe on Griffin's person and the fact that Griffin recently exited the truck—provided insufficient probable cause for a warrant to search the truck. Just because a person has a pipe in a pocket that contains untested white residue does not mean that the person's vehicle will contain evidence of a drug offense. However, in this case, the majority of evidence seized from the truck was in plain view in the truck bed. Griffin had no expectation of privacy regarding items in plain view, nor was a warrant required to seize the items in the truck bed. Therefore, any error in issuing the search warrant for the truck was harmless and not prejudicial. Additionally, the lawfully seized evidence in the truck bed was sufficient to support a finding of probable cause for issuance of another warrant to search Griffin's residence. Denial of Griffin's motion to suppress was affirmed. St. v. Griffin, 2004 MT 331, 324 M 143, 102 P3d 1206 (2004).

Admission of Allegedly Erroneous Evidence Regarding Charge for Which Defendant Acquitted — Harmless Error: Teters was charged with sexual intercourse without consent and with intimidation. The trial court allowed Teters' wife to testify that Teters was abusive, and Teters asserted on appeal that admitting the testimony was erroneous. The Supreme Court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine whether the alleged error was fundamental and automatically reversible or trial error and reversible if found to be prejudicial. The alleged error here was trial error. Part two of the Van Kirk test requires a showing of a reasonable possibility that the erroneously admitted evidence contributed to the conviction. In this case, the wife's testimony related only to the intimidation charge, and Teters was acquitted of intimidation, so any error in allowing the testimony was harmless. St. v. Teters, 2004 MT 137, 321 M 379, 91 P3d 559 (2004).

Exclusion of Testimony by Newspaper Editor and Reporter — Harmless Error: Defendant subpoenaed a newspaper editor and a reporter who had interviewed defendant's assault victim, but the District Court quashed the subpoenas pursuant to the Media Confidentiality Act, Title 26, ch. 1, part 9. Defendant contended that the District Court's action deprived him of the right to compel the attendance of witnesses and that his constitutional right should prevail over the media shield statutes. However, the state met its burden of showing that defendant was not prejudiced by the trial error because defendant was able to introduce the same evidence during cross-examination of the victim and made no additional offer of proof demonstrating the additional evidence that defendant sought to introduce through the editor and reporter. The media testimony would have added little or nothing to the report in the newspaper and other evidence introduced at trial. Absent a reasonable possibility that excluding the testimony contributed to defendant's conviction, quashing of the subpoenas was affirmed. St. v. Slavin, 2004 MT 76, 320 M 425, 87 P3d 495 (2004), followed in St. v. Kolb, 2009 MT 9, 349 M 10, 200 P3d 504 (2009).

Allowing Investigating Officer Witness to Remain in Courtroom — Harmless Error: Defendant requested that all witnesses be excluded from the courtroom during trial, but the trial court allowed a police officer who investigated the crime and who was a state witness to remain in the room when all other witnesses were excluded. Although it was error to allow the officer to remain and hear the testimony of the other witnesses, the Supreme Court applied St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), in determining that the trial error in this instance was harmless because the officer's presence did not prejudice defendant's case. St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), overruled in Faulconbridge v. St., 2006 MT 198, 333 M 186, 142 P3d 777 (2006), to the extent that a valid designated representative may not both remain in the courtroom and testify.

Character Evidence Improperly Admitted — Harmless Error: Defendant was charged with manufacture of dangerous drugs and sex crimes. The drug charge was severed, and defendant was convicted. When the sex crimes came to trial, the District Court allowed evidence of defendant's drug use. Defendant contended that the evidence was improperly admitted as bad character evidence because the state failed to meet the procedural requirements of the modified Just rule. The state asserted that the evidence was not admitted as character evidence, but rather admitted pursuant to the transaction rule because the drug use explained the circumstances surrounding the alleged sex offenses. The Supreme Court held that although the challenged evidence may have been relevant to explain the transaction, the evidence was improperly admitted in this case because the District Court had earlier determined that the charges were sufficiently distinct to warrant separate trials, so admission of drug use evidence in the sex crimes trial somewhat undermined the benefit that defendant gained from the earlier granting of the request for severance. Having defended against the drug charges in the first trial, defendant was faced with the evidence again. However, the Supreme Court then went on to apply the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine if admission of the evidence prejudiced defendant's right to a fair trial and found that the error was harmless. The evidence of drug use did not go to the proof of an element of the sex crimes, and only brief mention was made of drug use in closing arguments and then only in conjunction with other admissible evidence related to the transaction. Thus, the impact of the tainted evidence was minimal, and given other ample evidence upon which the state could develop its case, there was no reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence contributed to the conviction, which was therefore affirmed. St. v. Insua, 2004 MT 14, 319 M 254, 84 P3d 11 (2004).

Failure to Notify Defendant of State's Intent to Use Evidence of Alleged Violations at Probation Revocation Hearing Considered Due Process Violation — Harmless Error: At a hearing on the revocation of Pedersen's suspended sentence, the District Court allowed the state to introduce drug test results, even though drug use was not alleged prior to the hearing. Pedersen asserted that the failure to notify him that the drug test results would be used was a due process violation. The Supreme Court agreed. Even though a revocation hearing is not subject to the Montana Rules of Evidence, the hearing must be fundamentally fair, and minimum due process rights, including notice, extend to a revocation hearing. Thus, because Pedersen was not notified in advance, the District Court erred in admitting the drug test results. However, the error was harmless. The District Court's findings did not reference the drug test results, nor did the court rely on the results in revoking the suspended sentence, relying instead on the abundant evidence of Pedersen's violation of four other probation conditions. Therefore, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence revocation. St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003), distinguished in St. v. Sebastian, 2013 MT 347, 372 Mont. 522, 313 P.3d 198. See also St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299 (1987).

Jury Instruction Regarding False Exculpatory Statements Not to Be Given — Fabrication Instruction Improper but Not Prejudicial: During Nelson's trial on five felony charges, the trial court gave the jury an instruction allowing consideration of any showing of fabrication by Nelson as a circumstance tending to prove a consciousness of guilt, although not proof of guilt itself. Nelson argued that the instruction allowed improper comment on his credibility by interjecting argument into the court's instructions. The Supreme Court agreed. Citing the Ninth Circuit Model Jury Instruction Committee's recommendation, the court held that an instruction concerning false exculpatory statements should not be given, and expressly disapproved the use of such instructions in future trials. If evidence permits an adverse inference on statements by a defendant, counsel should be allowed to make arguments accordingly. General instructions on credibility of witnesses should suffice in most instances, obviating the need for more specific instructions. Here, in addition to the fabrication instruction, the trial court also provided a general jury instruction regarding the credibility of witnesses. The jury was free to reject Nelson's story and was entitled to accept all or part of the other key witnesses' testimony, so Nelson was not prejudiced by the giving of the fabrication instruction. St. v. Nelson, 2002 MT 122, 310 M 71, 48 P3d 739 (2002). See also St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929 (1999).

Improper Admission of Testimony by Highway Patrol Officer Regarding Effect of Prescription Medication on Driving Ability — Harmless Error: During Nobach's DUI trial, the District Court allowed testimony from a highway patrol officer regarding the effect of prescription medications on Nobach's driving ability, without specifically determining whether the testimony would be considered expert or lay opinion. The officer opined that Nobach's ability to drive safely was diminished as a result of the consumption of drugs. Following conviction, Nobach appealed on grounds that the testimony was an expert opinion that was improperly allowed without the requisite foundation. The state contended that the testimony was a lay opinion, and cited St. v. Bradley, 262 M 194, 864 P2d 787 (1993), and St. v. Carter, 285 M 449, 948 P2d 1173 (1997), for the proposition that a lay witness may give an opinion regarding intoxication based on the witness's personal observations. The Supreme Court first distinguished Bradley and Carter because the type of intoxication in those cases involved alcohol, while in Nobach's case, the officer concluded that drugs were involved only when alcohol use was ruled out by the administration of a Breathalyzer test. The court was not convinced that lay people are sufficiently knowledgeable about common symptoms of drug consumption and its effect on driving ability to offer lay testimony on the subject based on personal observation. The officer's opinion testimony was thus considered expert testimony rather than lay testimony, requiring an adequate foundation under Rule 702, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The officer's training and experience did not provide a sufficient foundation for admitting the expert testimony, so the District Court abused its discretion in allowing it. However, because the abuse was trial error rather than structural error, the error did not warrant automatic reversal. Rather, the question was whether the finder of fact was presented with admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence and, if so, whether the tainted evidence would have contributed to the conviction qualitatively by comparison. In this case, the state provided other expert testimony from a pharmacist that tended to prove the same facts as the officer's testimony, and because the officer's testimony would not have contributed to Nobach's conviction, the error was harmless and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Nobach, 2002 MT 91, 309 M 342, 46 P3d 618 (2002).

Unredacted Reference to Expiration Date of Felony Sentences — Harmless Error: At Bauer's incest trial, the District Court barred mention by the prosecution of Bauer's two prior felony convictions, but did rule that the fact of Bauer's lengthy prior prison incarceration and status as a probationer at the time of the incest were admissible as part of the transaction. To comply with the ruling, the state redacted the portions of two travel permits that listed Bauer's actual felony offenses; however, the state failed to black out the dates that the felony sentences would expire. The trial court ordered the state to redact the sentence expiration dates as well, and offered to instruct the jury to disregard any reference to Bauer's prior felony convictions on the travel permits. Defense counsel contended that a corrective instruction would only draw more attention to the prior felonies, and moved for a mistrial instead. The motion was denied and Bauer appealed. The Supreme Court applied the two-part analysis in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001) to determine if the error prejudiced Bauer's right to a fair trial. The erroneous presentation to the jury of the unredacted dates did constitute trial error, however, it was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt and did not contribute to Bauer's conviction or prejudice his right to a fair trial. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying Bauer's motion for a mistrial. St. v. Bauer, 2002 MT 7, 308 M 99, 39 P3d 689 (2002).

Prosecutor's Comment Alleging Uncontradicted Evidence Erroneous When Defendant Who Asserted Right to Remain Silent Was Only Person Who Could Offer Contradictory Evidence — Error Harmless: Harrington was arrested for DUI, was read his Miranda rights, and chose to remain silent. Harrington contended that his due process rights and privilege against self-incrimination were violated by testimony elicited and statements made by the prosecution during trial. Although Harrington failed to preserve the issues in the District Court, the Supreme Court applied the plain error doctrine pursuant to its discretionary power enunciated in St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), considering the totality of the circumstances and evaluating the nature of the constitutional rights implicated, rather than the sufficiency of the evidence. The court decided that because no comment was made that Harrington at any time refused to give a statement or refused to testify and because the prosecutor did not insinuate that an innocent person would have given a statement or testified, no Doyle error occurred (see Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976)). However, the prosecutor did comment during rebuttal that there was no evidence to contradict the state's case, which was error as an improper reference to Harrington's decision not to testify because Harrington was the only person who could have offered contradictory testimony (see St. v. Hart, 154 M 310, 462 P2d 885 (1969)). To determine whether the error was prejudicial, the court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001). The error was considered a trial error rather than a structural error, and because the error concerned comment rather than evidence, the court went on to determine whether it was harmless and contributed to the conviction. In this case, the single comment that the evidence was uncontradicted was an isolated one, and there was no reasonable possibility that it contributed to Harrington's conviction given the fact that during closing, the prosecutor focused on the driving errors Harrington made before being stopped, the videotape of Harrington's field sobriety tests, the arresting officer's expertise, and the results of the preliminary breath test. Harrington's constitutional rights were not prejudiced by the improper reference to his decision not to testify. Columbus v. Harrington, 2001 MT 258, 307 M 215, 36 P3d 937 (2001).

Improper Admission of Rape Examination Evidence as Not Probative of Issue of Consent — Error Harmless in Light of Other Admissible Evidence on Consent: At defendant's trial for sexual assault, the District Court admitted the testimony of a nurse practitioner regarding the mechanics of completing a rape kit. Defendant maintained on appeal that the evidence was not probative of the ultimate issue of consent, and the Supreme Court agreed. The evidence was irrelevant and admitted erroneously. However, the jury was presented with enough cumulative admissible evidence on the issue of consent as to render introduction of the inadmissible rape examination evidence harmless. Qualitatively, and in comparison to the victim's testimony concerning the examination, there was no reasonable possibility that the erroneously admitted evidence contributed to defendant's conviction or resulted in prejudice. St. v. Detonancour, 2001 MT 213, 306 M 389, 34 P3d 487 (2001).

Clarification of Harmless Error Analysis in Determining Whether Trial Court Error Resulted in Prejudice — Structural Error Versus Trial Error — Cumulative Evidence Test Versus Overwhelming Weight of Evidence Test: When determining whether trial court error has prejudiced a defendant, the Supreme Court has applied slightly different standards in various cases, resulting in some inconsistency and confusion over the proper test to be applied in a harmless error analysis. Over time, the "overwhelming weight of the evidence" test expressed in St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980) (affirmed in In re Petition of Brodniak v. St., 239 M 110, 779 P2d 71 (1989), and St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162 (1996)), eclipsed the more substantive inquiry of whether erroneously admitted evidence might have contributed to a conviction, resulting in an inclination to simply tally the quantity of the admissible evidence of guilt instead of evaluating the qualitative impact that the inadmissible evidence might have had on the finder of fact—an approach that the court found unacceptable. In order to preserve the substantial rights of the accused and the fundamental fairness of the criminal trial and to provide consistent guidance to practitioners, the Supreme Court found it appropriate to formally adopt an approach to harmless error issues that first defined the type of error in question and that second, depending on the type of error, set a uniform standard against which the error must be analyzed to determine if the error was sufficiently prejudicial to warrant reversal, completing the analysis begun in St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000). The first step is to analyze whether the claimed error is structural error or trial error. Structural error is the type that affects the framework within which the trial proceeds, such as errors in jury selection, total deprivation of the right to counsel, and lack of an impartial judge, and is automatically reversible without additional analysis or review. Trial error is the type that typically occurs during presentation of the case to a jury. It is not presumptively prejudicial and is thus subject to harmless error review pursuant to this section. Once a convicted person raises and establishes that evidence was erroneously admitted and has alleged that there is a reasonable possibility that the evidence might have contributed to a conviction, the state must demonstrate that the error was not prejudicial. To determine whether that reasonable possibility exists, the Supreme Court abandoned the "overwhelming weight of the evidence" test in McKenzie, Brodniak, and Fuhrmann in favor of the "cumulative evidence" test set out in Harrington v. Calif., 395 US 250 (1969). In making its proof under the cumulative evidence standard, the state must show admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence and demonstrate that the quality of the tainted evidence was such that there was no possibility that it might have contributed to the conviction. If the only evidence tending to prove an element of the crime is tainted, then reversal will be compelled. If the tainted evidence does not go to the proof of an element of the crime and there is no other evidence that proves the same facts as the tainted evidence, then the tainted evidence will be considered harmless only if there is no possibility that it might have contributed to the conviction. In the present case, the trial court erred in admitting evidence related to Van Kirk's performance on a horizontal gaze nystagmus test; however, there was other admissible cumulative evidence that proved that same fact of Van Kirk's DUI as the tainted evidence, so Van Kirk's right to a fair trial was not prejudiced and the DUI conviction was affirmed. St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), followed in St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001), St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), St. v. Slavin, 2004 MT 76, 320 M 425, 87 P3d 495 (2004), St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006), and St. v. Russette, 2008 MT 413, 347 M 285, 198 P3d 791 (2008). See also Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006).

DUI Test Result Improperly Admitted Without Establishing Requisite Basis for Reliability — Harmless Error: The City Court abused its discretion when it allowed horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) field test results into evidence without first establishing the requisite scientific basis for the test's reliability, as required by Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75 (1998). However, in this case, Robertson failed two other field sobriety tests, refused to perform the tests again after having already failed them, refused to submit to a Breathalyzer test, smelled of alcohol, had slurred speech, and exhibited an obvious lack of balance after getting out of his vehicle—all of which constituted other overwhelming evidence of guilt of DUI, rendering the error in allowing HGN test results harmless. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000).

Harmless Error Statute Inapplicable to Structural Errors: This section, although applicable to the review of most constitutional rights, does not apply to structural errors, such as an error in the jury selection process, because these types of errors cannot be assessed by the Supreme Court against the record for prejudicial impact. A structural error precedes the trial process and therefore cannot be quantitatively weighed against the evidence introduced at trial to determine whether the defendant was prejudiced by the error. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967). See also Dvorak v. Huntley Project Irrigation District, 196 M 167, 639 P2d 62, 38 St. Rep. 2176 (1981).

Telephone Jury-Summoning Procedure Violative of Statutory Selection Process — Showing of Substantial Compliance, Not Prejudice, Required — Reversible Error: Lamere, charged with killing Brownlee, filed a pretrial motion to strike the jury panel, but the motion was denied. The question on appeal was whether the District Court erred in concluding that Lamere failed to show that the telephone-dependent summoning procedure used in Cascade County prejudiced Lamere's substantial rights to a jury drawn and summoned according to law. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), in holding that the method of summoning jurors by telephone failed to comply with statutes governing the impaneling of a jury because jurors were neither served by mail nor served personally by the Sheriff. However, to warrant reversal, Robbins also required a showing of actual prejudice in addition to a substantial failure to comply with statutory law in drawing a jury panel. The Supreme Court chose to return to the per se rule of reversal for failure to substantially comply with statutes governing procurement of a trial jury, overruling the Robbins requirement of prejudice. The decision turned on the U.S. Supreme Court's contemporary distinction between trial error, to which harmless error review applies, and structural error, to which harmless error review is inapplicable (see Johnson v. U.S., 520 US 461, 137 L Ed 2d 718, 117 S Ct 1544 (1997), and its predecessors). In Lamere's case, the automatic rule of reversal prevailed because errors in the jury selection process are structural in nature, affecting the very framework within which a trial proceeds—errors that indelibly affect the essential fairness of the trial itself. A material failure to substantially comply with Montana statutes governing procurement of a trial jury may not be treated as harmless error because: (1) it precedes the presentation of evidence to the jury and cannot be analyzed as a mere trial error without resorting to speculation; (2) it precedes the trial process and cannot be quantitatively assessed for its prejudicial impact relative to the evidence introduced at trial; (3) it affects the very framework within which the trial proceeds; and (4) the impartiality of the jury goes to the very integrity of the justice system and because the right to an impartial jury is so essential to the concept of a fair trial that its violation cannot be considered harmless error. The substantial compliance standard vindicates not only the rights of the individual defendant but also the rights of the public in ensuring that the jury system remains inviolate, protecting a defendant's right to an impartial jury by encouraging reasonably strict compliance with statutory procedures intended to implement the fair cross-section guarantee of the sixth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967), Satterwhite v. Tex., 486 US 249, 100 L Ed 2d 284, 108 S Ct 1792 (1988), and Ariz. v. Fulminante, 499 US 279, 113 L Ed 302, 111 S Ct 1246 (1991), followed in St. v. Lopez, 2001 MT 97, 305 M 218, 26 P3d 745 (2001), and applied retroactively in Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Testimonial Tape-Recorded Interview Improperly Submitted to Jury — Error Harmless Because of Cumulative Nature of Evidence: Following an automobile accident in which his girlfriend was killed, Bales was interviewed by a highway patrol officer who taped the interview, during which Bales failed the HGN test and made allegedly prejudicial statements. Over Bales' objection, the District Court admitted the tape as an exhibit that the jury could listen to during deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that because the jury had not requested the playing of the tape, 46-16-504 applied, rather than 46-16-503. The Supreme Court found that the tape had a testimonial character and, citing St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991), for the common-law rule against submitting testimonial materials to the jury for unsupervised and unrestricted review during deliberations, held that the District Court abused its discretion in allowing the tape to go to the jury. However, allowing the jury to hear the tape did not unduly emphasize that testimony to the exclusion of other witnesses, nor were statements on the tape inconsistent with statements given by the witnesses at trial. Rather, the tape was merely cumulative of other evidence and did not prejudice Bales, so the error was harmless. St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Morse, 229 M 222, 746 P2d 108, 44 St. Rep. 1919 (1987), and overruling it to the extent that it is inconsistent with St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), regarding the submission of testimonial materials to a deliberating jury. See also St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992), St. v. Evans, 261 M 508, 862 P2d 417, 50 St. Rep. 1431 (1993), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Improper Admission of Hearsay Regarding Rape Victim's Prior Statements — Harmless Error: Four requirements must be met before a witness may testify as to a declarant's prior testimony. It was undisputed that in Mensing's trial for rape, the first three requirements were met: (1) the victim testified at trial; (2) the victim was available for cross-examination about her prior statements; and (3) the victim's statements to which arresting officers were testifying were consistent with the victim's testimony. However, the fourth requirement, that the statements must rebut an express or implied charge of fabrication, improper influence, or motive, was not met. Mensing made none of the requisite charges against the victim, and as a result, the officers' testimony regarding the victim's testimony was inadmissible hearsay and was improperly admitted. However, the hearsay statements were separately admitted through the victim's testimony, and Mensing had an opportunity to cross-examine regarding the statements at issue. Therefore, although the District Court abused its discretion in allowing the officers' testimony regarding prior consistent statements made by the victim, the error did not prejudice Mensing and was harmless. St. v. Mensing, 1999 MT 303, 297 M 172, 991 P2d 950, 56 St. Rep. 1220 (1999), following St. v. Veis, 1998 MT 162, 289 M 450, 962 P2d 1153 (1998).

Exclusion of Witnesses Constituting Abuse of Discretion — Harmless Error: Berg's counsel failed to previously disclose witnesses by timely filing a witness list with the District Court pursuant to 46-15-323. The court imposed the harshest sanction available by excluding Berg's witnesses, and Berg contended that he was entitled to a new trial because the court erred by excluding his witnesses. Berg's failure to disclose was not willful, nor would the state have been unduly prejudiced or surprised by Berg's noncompliance because the witnesses were known to the state, being among the same witnesses that the state intended to call. Thus, the District Court abused its discretion in imposing such a harsh sanction, and a less severe sanction should have been imposed. However, the exclusion of Berg's witnesses was not so prejudicial that Berg was deprived of a fair trial. The jury was provided with the essence of the witnesses' testimony through the cross-examination of one of the state's witnesses, so the exclusion of Berg's witnesses was harmless error. St. v. Berg, 1999 MT 282, 296 M 546, 991 P2d 428, 56 St. Rep. 1138 (1999), followed in St. v. Dezeew, 1999 MT 331, 297 M 379, 992 P2d 1276, 56 St. Rep. 1323 (1999).

Abuse of Discretion in Admission of Testimony That, Based on Shell Casing Pattern, Shots Fired From Van — Harmless Error: The District Court abused its discretion in admitting expert testimony from a police officer regarding whether shots were fired from a van. The testimony was based on the ejection pattern of shell casings at the scene of a shooting. There was an insufficient foundation to qualify the officer as an expert because he lacked specialized knowledge that would distinguish him from a lay person in opining whether the shots came from a van. Citing this section, the Supreme Court held nevertheless that, in light of testimony from several eyewitness that the shots were indeed fired from a van, the abuse of discretion was harmless error and should be disregarded. St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999).

Irrelevant Testimony Improperly Admitted but Not Prejudicial — Conviction Affirmed: The trial court improperly admitted witness testimony that was unrelated to the crime and clearly irrelevant. However, after evaluating the testimony under the totality of the circumstances in the context of the trial record, the Supreme Court concluded that admitting the testimony did not constitute undue prejudicial error and affirmed the conviction. St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358, 55 St. Rep. 344 (1998).

Admission of Psychiatrist's Opinion of Defendant's State of Mind During Theft Not Error With Respect to Conviction for Murder: Santos appealed his murder convictions on the basis that the state's expert witness commented on his mental state during the theft committed in conjunction with the murders. He also stated that the commission comments to 46-14-213 prohibit expert testimony before a jury on the ultimate issue of the defendant's mental state or mental capacity. The Supreme Court held that the admission of testimony concerning Santos's mental state during the theft was error but was harmless error with respect to his murder convictions. The Supreme Court also held that the commission comments to 46-14-213 go beyond the scope of the statutory language, that the statute is clear on its face, and that an expert witness may give an opinion on mental state or mental capacity. St. v. Santos, 273 M 125, 902 P2d 510, 52 St. Rep. 865 (1995).

Prison Officer's Recitation of Prison Policy as Harmless Error: Defendant objected to the testimony of a prison officer who had discovered a potentially dangerous weapon in defendant's cell on grounds that the officer's statement that the object had been sharpened was speculative and that the description of the object as evidence, tagging it, and taking steps to preserve it called for a legal conclusion that the officer was not qualified to make. Admission of the speculative statement was error but was cured by the court's striking it from the record and admonishing the jury to disregard it. The officer's descriptive testimony was a mere recitation of prison policy that was not related to the controlling facts of the case and did not cast defendant or his actions in a negative light. Because no reasonable possibility existed that the improperly admitted evidence contributed to the verdict, any error was harmless. St. v. Birthmark, 253 M 526, 833 P2d 1103, 49 St. Rep. 583 (1992).

Comment on Defendant's Failure to Testify: The defendant appealed his conviction, alleging that the jury instruction provided by the prosecution commented on his refusal to testify and prejudiced his case. The Supreme Court held that even though the appeal was not timely, the court would hear it in order to preserve the substantial rights of the defendant. The court stated that the instruction would not have been prejudicial if requested by the defendant and that the third paragraph of the instruction relating to evaluating a testifying defendant's credibility should not have been given but was harmless error. St. v. Amsk, 243 M 39, 792 P2d 1109, 47 St. Rep. 1075 (1990).

Prosecutor's Remarks Improper — Evidence of Guilt Overwhelming: The prosecutor's remarks concerning defendant's delayed notice of a theory of self-defense and concerning his silence were improper and unnecessary to the case, but the evidence of defendant's guilt was so overwhelming that the improper comments can be classified as harmless error beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989).

Exhibit Offered Into Evidence by Trial Judge — Harmless Error: Although there is no provision in Montana law that permits the trial court to offer its own exhibits, the court offered a document into evidence. If this was error, it was harmless because the document had been read into evidence in full by the prosecutor. St. v. Hibbs, 239 M 308, 780 P2d 182, 46 St. Rep. 1705 (1989).

Overwhelming Evidence — Totality of Circumstances: In an earlier opinion in this criminal matter, the Supreme Court held that it was harmless error for the trial court to admit evidence of the state's expert witness concerning his belief that the rape victim was not malingering and the statistical percentages of false rape accusations. In response to defendant's argument that the court did not apply the proper harmless error test, the Supreme Court held that the analysis of the issue of an expert's comment on a witness's credibility centers on the rules of evidence, not on a constitutional analysis. The overwhelming evidence rule is one method of ascertaining whether there is a reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence contributed to the verdict. When assessing the prejudicial effect of an error, the court will examine the totality of the circumstances in which the error occurred. The overwhelming evidence in this case supports the guilty verdict. In re Petition of Brodniak v. St., 239 M 110, 779 P2d 71, 46 St. Rep. 1550 (1989), followed in St. v. Birthmark, 253 M 526, 833 P2d 1103, 49 St. Rep. 583 (1992), St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106, 49 St. Rep. 586 (1992), St. v. Williams, 262 M 530, 866 P2d 1099, 50 St. Rep. 1672 (1993), and in St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323, 51 St. Rep. 335 (1994). Bower was followed in St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000).

Unanimity Among Appellate Members — No Prerequisite to Finding of Harmless Error: Defendant argued that, as a matter of law, evidence cannot be overwhelming for purposes of a harmless error analysis if one or more members of the appellate tribunal are not convinced that it is. The Supreme Court held that unanimity among the appellate tribunal has never been a prerequisite to a finding of harmless error when using the overwhelming evidence test, even if the test is used to determine the magnitude of constitutional error. In re Petition of Brodniak v. St., 239 M 110, 779 P2d 71, 46 St. Rep. 1550 (1989).

Victim's Version of Facts Not Inherently Incredible: The victim testified that her estranged husband broke into her house and attempted to get into bed with her. She went to another room with him so he would not see her boyfriend who was in her bed. She testified that her husband assaulted and raped her after she left the bedroom. The defendant's jury conviction was affirmed on appeal, with the Supreme Court ruling that the weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses are exclusively in the province of the trier of fact and the court would uphold the verdict if there was substantial evidence to support it. St. v. Urness, 239 M 58, 778 P2d 419, 46 St. Rep. 1510 (1989).

Misrepresentation of Statute by Prosecutor — Not Prosecutorial Misconduct or Suppression of Evidence: Defendant claimed that the prosecution misrepresented the immunity statute to the court in an effort to prevent testimony by a witness, which amounted to a suppression of evidence. The Supreme Court found the prosecutor was incorrect in his interpretation, due to a statutory amendment, but that neither the court nor defense counsel was aware of the amendment either; therefore, the innocent misstatement of the law did not rise to the level of a knowing, bad faith scheme or action constituting misconduct. St. v. Dannels, 226 M 80, 734 P2d 188, 44 St. Rep. 472 (1987).

Negligent Suppression of Evidence — Harmless Error: In an appeal involving the negligent suppression of evidence, the court agreed with appellant that the state acted improperly in suppressing four taped witness statements during discovery and a possibly incriminating statement made by appellant during his arrest and in endorsing an additional witness on the first day of trial. However, the court found that the suppressed evidence was either repetitive of other testimony or minimally supportive of a self-defense theory, and that since the defense knew of the additional witness' connection with and importance in the case, it could not convincingly claim surprise at the endorsement. Therefore, all errors were held to be harmless and not grounds for reversal. St. v. Wallace, 223 M 454, 727 P2d 520, 43 St. Rep. 1908 (1986), followed, with regard to application of harmless error rule to admissibility of hearsay testimony, in St. v. Alexander, 265 M 192, 875 P2d 345, 51 St. Rep. 474 (1994).

Robbery by Person With Hand Under Coat — Testimony About Abdominal Illness: Defendant put a hand under his coat during a robbery and the store clerk testified he believed defendant had a gun. Defendant testified he was holding his hand on a place where he had severe abdominal pain. It was error to sustain the state's objection to the relevance of testimony of defendant's mother as to the nature of his illness, but the error was harmless because there was abundant testimony by defendant, his brother, and his sister on the matter of his physical condition. St. v. Lewis, 220 M 418, 715 P2d 1064, 43 St. Rep. 492 (1986).

Admission of Death Certificate With Hearsay Statement That Decedent Was Passenger — Harmless Error: In a negligent homicide case, defendant contended decedent was driving. The trial court admitted a death certificate with a statement in it that decedent was a passenger in the truck that crashed. While the death certificate was admissible to prove the victim's death, the statement about the victim being a passenger was based on hearsay and should have been excised. However, the Supreme Court held that failure to do so was harmless error in light of the testimony by other witnesses that established a substantial basis for concluding that decedent was a passenger. St. v. Gould, 216 M 455, 704 P2d 20, 42 St. Rep. 946 (1985).

Withholding of Informants' Names — Harmless Error: Defendant moved for a continuance when, with a trial date set for August 2, the informants' names were not revealed to defendant's attorney until late July 30 and the County Attorney knew defendant's attorney would be out of town on August 1. The District Court denied defendant's motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court held that although the Sheriff and police acted improperly in refusing to comply with the District Court's order to disclose the informants' names, this was harmless error in this case and was not grounds for a continuance. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the continuance because the informants could provide nothing that would refute the state's case. The Supreme Court stated that it did not condone the actions of the law enforcement agencies or the County Attorney. St. v. Warnick, 216 M 102, 699 P2d 1049, 42 St. Rep. 675 (1985).

Misleading Jury as to Effect of Acquittal of Defendant: In his closing argument in a trial on the charge of sexual intercourse without consent, the prosecutor told the jury that in order to find the defendant not guilty, the jury would have to tell the alleged victim that she was a drug pusher, slut, and liar. On appeal, the Supreme Court rejected defendant's claim that the statements were so inflammatory and prejudicial that he had been denied his right to a fair trial, ruling that the prosecutor's error did not affect defendant's substantial rights. St. v. Sanderson, 214 M 437, 692 P2d 479, 42 St. Rep. 94 (1985).

Admission of Defendant's Spontaneous Remarks — Motion to Strike During Cross-Examination: Defendant was charged with and convicted of sexual intercourse without consent. During his trial, the arresting officer was asked if defendant had made any statements. Defense counsel objected on the grounds of hearsay. The court was prepared to accept the evidence under the "excited utterance" exception to the hearsay rule. The officer testified defendant said, "Which bitch did it?". No immediate objection was raised, but during cross-examination defense counsel made a motion to strike, which was denied. The prosecution made no further reference to the statement. On appeal, the Supreme Court relied on Poindexter & Orr Livestock Co. v. Oreg. Short Line Ry., 33 M 338, 83 P 886 (1905), which held that "the practice, whether in civil or criminal cases, of deliberately permitting evidence to be given without objection in the first instance, and then moving to strike it on grounds which might readily have been availed of to exclude it when offered, is not to be tolerated". The court said that even if it were to focus on the allegations of prejudice, there was no reasonable possibility that the evidence might have contributed to the conviction. St. v. Bauer, 210 M 298, 683 P2d 946, 41 St. Rep. 1066 (1984).

Judge Asking Attorney Witness if He Practiced Criminal Law — No Prejudicial Error: A witness for defendant charged with felonious issuing of a bad check testified that as defendant's attorney he told defendant not to pay the check, which the bank had returned unpaid, because the auto had a defect and defendant might have a setoff under the Uniform Commercial Code. The trial judge asked the witness-attorney if he practiced criminal law. The question was not prejudicial error. St. v. Lloyd, 208 M 195, 676 P2d 229, 41 St. Rep. 263 (1984).

Judge Calling Testimony "Self-Serving" — No Plain Error: At trial of defendant for felonious issuing of a bad check in payment for an auto, defendant sought to have one of his attorneys testify that defendant did not pay the check, which the bank had returned unpaid, because the auto had a defect and the attorney had advised defendant not to pay the check as he might have a setoff under the Uniform Commercial Code. The prosecution objected to the questioning and the court called the testimony "self-serving", but allowed it. Any error in the judge's comment need not be considered on appeal as no objection was made below. The plain error doctrine would not be invoked because any prejudice was so slight that there was no reversible error. Any technical error was rendered harmless by judge's instruction to disregard his comment. St. v. Lloyd, 208 M 195, 676 P2d 229, 41 St. Rep. 263 (1984).

Failure to Object to Judge Qualifying Ten-Year-Old Sexual Crime Victim as Witness in View of Jury — Not "Plain Error" — Mass of Damaging Evidence Precluding Any Prejudice: In the presence of the jury, the District Court Judge questioned the 10-year-old victim of a sexual crime and an aggravated assault about whether she was aware of the consequences of taking an oath and testifying. Defense counsel did not object. Although it would have been better to have conducted the questioning away from the jury and the questions should have been framed differently, any mistake did not warrant the application of the "plain error" rule of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) because the defendant was not prejudiced by the manner of qualifying the victim in light of all of the independent and highly damaging evidence against him. St. v. Smith, 208 M 66, 676 P2d 185, 41 St. Rep. 176 (1984).

Parole Status of Defendant — Prosecution Questions Eliciting: On the first day of trial, the prosecutor agreed to caution his witnesses to avoid mention of defendant's parole status. The prosecutor breached his promise by twice asking one of his witnesses a question eliciting the answer that defendant was on parole. The court cautioned the jury to disregard the testimony. As a matter of law, the Supreme Court could not hold that failure to grant motion for mistrial was an abuse of discretion. Prejudice would not be presumed. Defendant failed to show that a substantial right was denied and that there was a reasonable possibility the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to his conviction. The evidence supporting conviction was substantial, if not overwhelming, and defendant's version of the events was simply incredible. St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262, 40 St. Rep. 2023 (1983).

If intent was a disputed issue at trial, a reviewing court could not rationally conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that an unconstitutional Sandstrom instruction was harmless error and could not have tainted a jury verdict, even if the evidence of intent was overwhelming. The appropriate inquiry is whether any reasonable juror could have given the presumption raised by the instruction persuasion-shifting or conclusive effect. [Annotator's Note: See McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981), apparently holding to the contrary.] In re Hamilton, 721 F2d 1189 (9th Cir. 1983).

Admission of Pre-Miranda Statement Not Prejudicial — Untimely Motion to Suppress: The defendant made the same damaging statements to the police before and after Miranda warnings were given. A motion to suppress the prior damaging statements was denied because of the motion's untimeliness under 46-13-301. Although the Supreme Court has the power under this section to overturn a conviction if the substantial rights of the defendant have been prejudiced, the slight cumulative effect of admitting the prior statements and the untimeliness of the motion to suppress do not warrant a consideration of the constitutionality of admission of the prior statements. St. v. Hart, 200 M 185, 650 P2d 768, 39 St. Rep. 1673 (1982).

Expert Testimony on Ultimate Issue: In a prosecution for sexual intercourse without consent, the County Attorney asked a doctor if he had formed a clinical impression of the victim. The doctor replied that it was his impression that the woman had been raped. The doctor's statement was admissible under Rule 704, Montana Rules of Evidence, since he was qualified by experience and personal observation. Further, the statement was not sufficiently prejudicial to constitute reversible error. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982).

Prosecutorial Comment on Presumption of Intoxication: In negligent homicide trial of defendant involved in auto collision while he was driving after drinking, a forensic scientist testified that blood taken from defendant 2 hours after the accident had a .17 blood alcohol content and that at that level one's driving ability would be obviously impaired and speech, hearing, balance, judgment, reaction time, and other motor skills would be affected. The trial judge ruled that because the charge was negligent homicide he would not instruct the jury on the statutory presumption that one with a .10 blood alcohol content level is under the influence. Prosecutor twice disregarded the ruling, stating in the cross-examination of a witness and in his closing argument that .10 is the legal rate of intoxication. Prosecutor used an improper and unacceptable tactic, but defendant was not prejudiced as there was already sufficient evidence as to what a .17 blood alcohol content level meant. St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177, 39 St. Rep. 1072 (1982).

Right of Confrontation — Harmless Error: A sheriff testified as to statements made by a defendant to the sheriff that incriminated codefendants. Because the defendant did not testify at trial, the codefendants' rights of confrontation were violated. However, because there was overwhelming independent admissible evidence of the facts contained in the defendant's statements, the error was harmless. St. v. Powers, 198 M 289, 645 P2d 1357, 39 St. Rep. 989 (1982).

Sandstrom Instruction — Overwhelming Evidence of Intent: Petitioner was convicted of deliberate homicide by shooting victim four times in the head. Federal District Court found it to be a violation of due process that a Sandstrom instruction that "the law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts" had been given at trial, and granted habeas corpus. The circuit court reversed on appeal, stating that it was inconceivable that any rational juror could have been convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that petitioner shot victim four times in the head without also being convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that he did so "knowingly or purposefully" (the mental element of deliberate homicide in Montana). Thus the error was harmless, for the jury would beyond a reasonable doubt have reached the same conclusion even absent the instruction. McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir 1981), reversing McGuinn v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 478 (D.C. Mont. 1980).

Harm to Credibility of Probationer — Alleged Error Versus Weak Alibi Testimony: Defendant's assertion that admission in probation revocation hearing of inadmissible probation violations had a detrimental impact on his credibility was pure fantasy. The record on appeal disclosed that if anything affected his credibility, it was his own testimony and that of his alibi witnesses that he was not present at the time and place of the alleged assault on his mother-in-law (one of the bases for petition for probation revocation) in the face of her positive identification of him as her assailant. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981).

Evidence of Offenses Not Charged — Probation Revocation: Admission in evidence, in probation revocation hearing, of alleged probation violations not contained in the petition to revoke was error but did not affect defendant's substantial rights and must be disregarded where two of the alleged violations were not made a basis of revocation of probation and, although the third was, the State introduced no evidence on the matter and all evidence on it was introduced by defendant. Defendant could not predicate reversible error on testimony he himself introduced. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981). See also St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299, 44 St. Rep. 181 (1987).

Police Officer — Foundation for Testimony: Defendant was charged with intimidation. He had threatened the victim, who took his license plate number and reported it to the police. At the trial an officer testified that a license check had been run and that the car was registered to the defendant. Defendant objected that no foundation had been laid to establish that the officer had personally made the license check and that the testimony was hearsay. The Supreme Court agreed, saying the State should have introduced a certified copy of the car's registration record. The Supreme Court also held that the evidence of ownership was a small part of the case against defendant and that the admission of the testimony did not affect defendant's substantial rights. The error was disregarded. St. v. Wurtz, 195 M 226, 636 P2d 246, 38 St. Rep. 1808 (1981).

Mistrial Properly Denied — Testimony Violating Order In Limine Reaching Jury by Other Means: Where, in a prosecution for burglary and forgery, the prosecution technically violated an order in limine prohibiting the prosecution from soliciting any testimony from any witness regarding statements made by one Anna Doney, the District Court did not err in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a mistrial. The testimony elicited in violation of the order in limine was also put before the jury when Anna Doney was called as a rebuttal witness for the state. Thus, the error caused by the testimony objected to was merely technical and did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Wilson, 193 M 318, 631 P2d 1273, 38 St. Rep. 1040 (1981).

Sandstrom Instruction — Permissive Inference or Conclusive Presumption: A "Sandstrom-type" instruction was given at petitioner's trial, which resulted in his conviction on seven counts of armed robbery and one count of assault. No objection to the instruction was made at the trial, but the Supreme Court reviewed the instruction under the "plain error" rule [however, see 1983 amendment changing the law]. Petitioner contended that the instruction either shifts the burden of proof on the issue of intent from the State to the defendant or constitutes a presumption against the defendant, either of which is constitutionally impermissible under Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979). The instruction given was a permissive inference and not a conclusive presumption. The questioned instruction was not a "naked" presumption as in Sandstrom; the instructions as a whole made it abundantly clear that the State bears the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt every essential element of the crimes of which defendant was charged. The court found that the error, if any, was harmless. Parker v. Crist, 190 M 376, 621 P2d 484, 37 St. Rep. 2048 (1980).

Errors in Jury Instructions on Accomplice Testimony, Oral Admissions, and Intent Minimized by Other Instructions and Nature of Evidence: Appealing his conviction for theft, a defendant alleged errors in the trial court's jury instructions. Error was claimed in the rejection of cautionary instructions regarding accomplice testimony and oral admissions. The reviewing court agreed that the cautionary instructions should have been given but disagreed with the contention that the error was reversible. They noted that the instructions were elaborate and misleading and lacked the simple language of 26-1-303(4). The error was minimized by other instructions. The defendant also alleged error in the giving of the Sandstrom instruction on intent. The reviewing court found the instruction harmless here because the evidence of intent was overwhelming and the essential issue of the case was the identity of the gunman, not his intent. St. v. Dolan, 190 M 195, 620 P2d 355, 37 St. Rep. 1860 (1980).

Admission of Statements by Defendant: The Supreme Court found no substantial prejudicial effect on the defendant arising from the introduction of statements made by the defendant and admitted by the trial court as a verbal act exception. St. v. McGuinn, 177 M 215, 581 P2d 417 (1978).

Denial of Discovery: A motion to discover papers went unrulred upon, and no objection was made. Therefore, the substantial rights of the defendant were not violated, and a conviction will not be overturned due to harmless error. St. v. Armstrong, 172 M 296, 562 P2d 1129 (1977).

Hearsay: When the defendant voluntarily testified and admitted he had fired shots at the victim, the admission of testimony by a witness that someone said "Grady did it" was harmless error. St. v. Grady, 166 M 168, 531 P2d 681 (1975).

Comments on Defendant's Past Record:

Remarks of the prosecutor referring to the defendant's association with the drug culture, although offensive, were reasonably founded on the testimony and evidence, and such remarks did not deny the defendant a fair trial. St. v. Flamm, 165 M 128, 526 P2d 119 (1974).

A statement by prosecuting attorney in closing argument that the perpetrators of the crime were "thick as thieves" was not construed as a comment on the past record of the defendant but merely as an argument that the defendant was guilty of the robbery with which he was charged in that prosecution and did not affect any substantial right of the defendant. St. v. Romero, 161 M 333, 505 P2d 1207 (1973).

Remarks About Request for Counsel: The testimony of the police officer that the defendant did not want to talk to the police but asked to call his lawyer, although irrelevant and improper, was harmless error when the State presented overwhelming evidence of guilt and the defendant himself testified at trial. St. v. Flamm, 165 M 128, 526 P2d 119 (1974).

Remark in the Presence of Jurors: A statement of opinion made in the presence of other jurors by a prospective juror who was never seated that she was convinced that the defendants were guilty was not a sufficient showing of prejudice to require a new trial. St. v. Rhodes, 164 M 455, 524 P2d 1095 (1974).

Invitation to Juror to Participate in Experiment: The prosecuting attorney's invitation to a juror to participate in an experiment not supported by the evidence was harmless error because the juror did not participate and the trial court immediately sustained the defendant's objection. St. v. Thompson, 164 M 415, 524 P2d 1115 (1974).

Inaccurate Instructions: Instructing the jury on assault by willfully inflicting grievous bodily harm when the defendant had been charged with assault with intent to prevent or resist his lawful detention or apprehension was harmless error because the evidence conclusively demonstrated the defendant's guilt of the offense charged. St. v. Jones, 161 M 117, 505 P2d 97 (1973).

Witness' Remarks: When the trial court on the defendant's motion directed the state's witnesses not to reveal the victim's pregnancy, the fact that one witness mentioned the pregnancy to the jury did not provide a basis for a mistrial since no substantial right was affected. St. v. Bentley, 155 M 383, 472 P2d 864 (1970).

Improper Questions by Prosecution: In a prosecution under former law for first degree assault, questions posed by the prosecution relating to potential criminal bribery, if error, were technical errors that did not provide a basis for a reversal in view of the facts that the questions posed were not evidence, they were answered in the negative, and the trial court had instructed the jury not to consider the remarks of counsel. St. v. Gallagher, 151 M 501, 445 P2d 45 (1968).

Anonymous Witnesses on Indictment: Under former law, if a person went to trial under an indictment on which the witnesses' names were designated as Richard Roe and John Doe and was convicted, the Supreme Court was required to sustain the conviction if possible and the burden was on the defendant to show prejudice. State ex rel. Porter v. District Court, 124 M 249, 220 P2d 1035 (1950).

Erroneous Instruction: Erroneous instructions are not cause for reversal in the absence of any prejudice. St. v. Hay, 120 M 573, 194 P2d 232 (1948).

Instructions to Jury: On an appeal from a judgment of conviction for forgery, while it was error to advise the jury, in an instruction as to the purpose for which testimony of other like acts had been admitted, that testimony had been admitted relating to certain "forgeries", since whether or not a forgery had been committed was the fact to be determined by the jury, in view of other portions of the charge carefully safeguarding the rights of the defendant, the inadvertent use of the term "forgeries" could not have worked to his prejudice. St. v. Daems, 97 M 486, 37 P2d 322 (1934).

Refusal to Strike Testimony: In a prosecution for the larceny of two calves, the refusal of the trial court to strike the testimony of a cattleman that two cows, the condition of the bags of which indicated that they had lost their calves but a short time theretofore, were acting as though they were looking for them, was held not reversible error under the circumstances, among them that the defendant killed the calves after being charged with their theft and thus blocked the test proposed by the stock inspector to get the cows and see whether they would claim the calves. St. v. Grimsley, 96 M 327, 30 P2d 85 (1934).

Challenge to Juror: In a prosecution for receiving stolen property, a juror answered voir dire questions propounded by the State by admitting that he was a close friend of the defendant but could try him as if he were a stranger but that he would like to be excused. He then stated that he would not convict the defendant even if he believed him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Thereafter, however, on examination by the defendant's counsel, he again asserted that he would vote for conviction regardless of his friendship for the defendant if proper under the law and the evidence. The court's ruling excusing the juror may not be held reversible error even though it be conceded that technical error was committed in sustaining the challenge on an improper ground. St. v. Huffman, 89 M 194, 296 P 789 (1931).

Improper Admission of Judgment Roll: While the trial court erred in permitting the State in a perjury trial to introduce the judgment roll in the cause in which the alleged false testimony was given, containing papers not properly part thereof under statute, the procedure amounted to a mere irregularity which could not in any manner have prejudiced the defendant. St. v. Jackson, 88 M 420, 293 P 309 (1930).

Leading Questions: Alleged error in overruling objections to several questions claimed to have been leading but which were of no special importance and merely explanatory in character was not grounds for a new trial. St. v. Wong Fong, 75 M 81, 241 P 1072 (1925).

Judge's Remarks: A remark of the trial judge in passing upon an objection to a question asked a witness for the defense in a criminal cause to the effect: "I don't think that is very material; let him answer", while improper, was a technical error and nonprejudicial when considered in connection with the particular circumstances. St. v. Sedlacek, 74 M 201, 239 P 1002 (1925); St. v. Cassill, 71 M 274, 229 P 716 (1924).

Introduction in Evidence of Rape Victim's Clothing: In a prosecution for attempted rape, the introduction in evidence of the clothing worn by the prosecuting witness, though immaterial, was not reversible error when there was no evidence that the articles were muddy, torn, and bloodstained, as claimed, and thus likely to inflame the minds of the jurors and when the original exhibits were not certified to the Supreme Court for inspection. Prejudice cannot be presumed but must be made to appear affirmatively. Lindeberg v. Howe, 67 M 195, 215 P 230 (1923); St. v. Prouty, 60 M 310, 199 P 281 (1921).

Admission of Evidence: An erroneous ruling of the court in admitting evidence which could not affect the substantial rights of the parties must be disregarded. Church v. Zywert, 58 M 102, 190 P 291 (1920).

Technical Error — Defective Information: The Supreme Court will not reverse a judgment of conviction on account of technical errors or defects in the information when the defendant was fully advised of the nature of the charge against him to enable him to prepare to meet that charge and his substantial rights were not affected by the defect. St. v. Wehr, 57 M 469, 188 P 930 (1920).

Unresponsive Answer of Witness: Though refusal to strike out an unresponsive answer in which the witness volunteers a statement of facts from which the complaining party has probably suffered prejudice will result in a reversal of the judgment, such refusal is harmless error when the objectionable statement was volunteered on cross-examination after having been twice before made on his direct examination. St. v. Jones, 48 M 505, 139 P 441 (1914).

Prejudice to Substantial Right: A judgment of conviction will not be reversed for error in the trial proceedings unless it has prejudiced or tended to prejudice the defendant in respect to a substantial right. St. v. Rhys, 40 M 131, 105 P 494 (1909).

Presence of Jurors When Verdict Delivered: When the record did not show that the jurors were not all present when the verdict was delivered and from the minutes no other fair inference could be drawn than that they were actually present at the time, the omission from the minutes of a statement that their names were called prior to delivery of the verdict was not an error that prejudiced the defendant in his substantial rights. St. v. De Lea, 36 M 531, 93 P 814 (1908).

Information Defective in Form With Immaterial Averments: An information charging an attempt to obtain money by false pretenses, though defective in form and containing immaterial averments, is sufficient to sustain a conviction when it is apparent that the defendant has suffered no prejudice. St. v. Phillips, 36 M 112, 92 P 299 (1907).

Technical Error: A judgment will not be reversed for a purely technical error in giving an instruction. St. v. Tracey, 35 M 552, 90 P 791 (1907).

This section is designed to reduce the number of appeals, retrials, and delays in each case by giving the Supreme Court the power to do complete justice in every case. It will also aid in reducing expense and the massive compilation of records which results in numerous appeals of the same case.

Subsections (1), (2) and (5) are part of our present code.

Subsections (3) and (4) broaden the power of the Supreme Court so that it may more effectively give a complete answer to the parties before it.

Case Notes

Exclusion of Defendant From Pretrial Meeting to Determine Whether Defendant Be Allowed to Proceed Pro Se Violative of Right to Be Present and Defend Oneself — Reversible Error: An alleged violation of the constitutional right to be present and appear at all criminal proceedings does not warrant automatic reversal. Rather, the Supreme Court considers the effect that a violation has on a defendant to determine whether a defendant has suffered any conceivable prejudice. In this case, Mann was excluded from a pretrial meeting to determine whether Mann would be represented by counsel or proceed pro se at trial on burglary and misdemeanor assault charges. This important determination implicated a substantial issue in the scope of the criminal proceedings, and excluding Mann from the meeting, at which Mann's counsel portrayed Mann in a negative light, violated Mann's right to be present and defend himself and right to effective assistance of counsel. Violation of these fundamental constitutional rights was sufficiently prejudicial to constitute reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Mann, 2006 MT 160, 332 M 476, 139 P3d 159 (2006).

Supreme Court Reduction of Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent to Sexual Assault — Relevance of Testimony of Victims Regarding Belief That Massage Therapist's Actions Were Criminal: Stevens was convicted of two counts of sexual intercourse without consent after having sexual contact with two female patients at his massage clinic. The Supreme Court determined that there was insufficient proof that the offenses were committed without consent and, without addressing whether sexual assault was a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent, reduced the offenses to sexual assault. Even though Stevens was not specifically charged with sexual assault, there was no question that he was reasonably apprised of the sexual assault charges against him. Stevens offered a jury instruction, which was given without objection, stating that sexual intercourse without consent necessarily included the offense of sexual assault. Evidence clearly showed that Stevens had sexual contact with the victims, and testimony from the victims regarding whether they considered sexual contact by a massage professional to be criminal was relevant and admissible, tending to make the existence of a material element of the crime, namely whether the crime was committed without consent, more likely than without the evidence. St. v. Stevens, 2002 MT 181, 311 M 52, 53 P3d 356 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Black, 270 M 329, 891 P2d 1162 (1995).

Modification of Conviction From Sexual Intercourse Without Consent to Sexual Assault: Defendant was convicted under 45-5-503 of sexual intercourse without consent. On appeal, he claimed that penetration had not been proved at trial. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed the conviction. The victim had testified indirectly on the issue, but her testimony was ambiguous, and she was not asked to explain her statements. The Supreme Court stated that the fact that this is a delicate subject does not eliminate the requirement that the state prove each element of its case beyond a reasonable doubt. The court further ruled that it would be a violation of the constitutional protection against double jeopardy to remand for a new trial. The state had its opportunity to prove its case and failed to do so. Under its authority set forth in 46-20-703 to reduce the offense of which a defendant has been convicted to a lesser included offense because the record contains evidence establishing all of the elements of sexual assault, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for entry of judgment finding the defendant guilty of the crime of sexual assault. St. v. Lundblade, 221 M 185, 717 P2d 575, 43 St. Rep. 732 (1986).

Mere Allegations of Prejudice Insufficient to Satisfy Cumulative Error Doctrine: Defendant contended that the overall demeanor of the prosecution and the District Court, together with other alleged errors, required a reversal of his conviction; however, he articulated no particular comments or remarks and alleged no prejudice to his substantial rights. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the cumulative error doctrine, which is the accumulation of errors which prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial, but noted that mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice are insufficient to satisfy the doctrine. The resolution of the alleged errors indicated no error meriting reversal of this case, and the court held that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing prejudice and declined to reverse his conviction on grounds of cumulative error. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), St. v. Hatfield, 2018 MT 229, 392 Mont. 509, 426 P.3d 569.

Robbery With Gun Apparently Under Coat — Sentence of Thirty Years Permissible: Defendant claimed that his 30-year sentence for robbery of a convenience store was disproportionate to the facts (which included a finding that he had his hand under his coat and the store clerk believed he had a gun). The sentence was within the permissible statutory range, there was no clear abuse of discretion, and the sentence was properly reviewable in the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court. St. v. Lewis, 220 M 418, 715 P2d 1064, 43 St. Rep. 492 (1986), following St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

New Trial Denied — Alleged Perjury Unproven — Testimony on Count of Which Defendant Acquitted: Appellant contended that certain testimony was blatant perjury. Perjury could not be discerned from the face of the testimony, and appellant offered no other evidence to support his claim. Furthermore, the testimony was on a count of which appellant was found not guilty and was immaterial to the two counts of which he was found guilty. A new trial requested on the ground of the testimony was properly denied. St. v. Harris, 210 M 382, 682 P2d 185, 41 St. Rep. 1107 (1984).

Pro Se Appeal Filed Without Briefs — General Review on Court's Own Motion: Where the defendant made the defense of his deliberate homicide case difficult by failing to cooperate with his several attorneys, and after conviction was granted several extensions by the Supreme Court for filing a transcript and his first brief, but nevertheless failed to file a brief and specifications of error, the Supreme Court on its own motion reviewed the District Court transcript for typical kinds of errors and found: (1) that the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction as the defendant was convicted on the basis of his own testimony; (2) that there were no errors in the jury instructions given on the evidence and the elements of the crime; (3) that assistance of counsel was adequate and that the failure of defendant's counsel to subpoena evidence or witnesses was not relevant to the crime charged; and (4) that the statutory penalties for deliberate homicide with a dangerous weapon did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Graham, 206 M 49, 669 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 1499 (1983).

Double Jeopardy — Remand Order Not Required to Specify New Trial: A defendant was convicted of aiding and abetting another in witness tampering and aggravated assault. The conviction was reversed, and the defendant was rearraigned on the original charges. The defendant was convicted of lesser included offenses. On appeal, the defendant alleged double jeopardy. He argued that the failure to order specifically and expressly a new trial precluded further action. A remand order need not order a new trial for one to occur. The remand order in this case was supported by the opinion of the Supreme Court, which stated that in ordering dismissal the court did not mean to preclude a refile of charges. On review, the Supreme Court said it was clear its intention was to leave the door open to retrial, and accordingly a new trial was granted. Therefore, the defendant's double jeopardy rights were not violated by his second trial. St. v. Cardwell, 191 M 539, 625 P2d 553, 38 St. Rep. 451 (1981).

Duty of District Court on Remand: In 1971 Olson was acquitted by reason of insanity of two counts of rape. He was committed to the state hospital but walked away from the hospital shortly after his arrival. In 1977 Olson was arrested and returned to the state hospital. He petitioned for his discharge, and the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court with instructions to make specific findings. On remand, the District Court set aside the 1971 acquittal on the basis that it was procured by Olson's fraud upon the court. Olson appealed this decision, and the Supreme Court found that the District Court cannot vacate an earlier District Court judgment and further instructed the District Court to determine Olson's present dangerousness as directed in the Supreme Court's original opinion. St. v. District Court, 184 M 346, 602 P2d 1002 (1979).

Reduction of Sentence: The sentence of a defendant who pleaded guilty to grand larceny to 4 years in the state prison was reduced to 1 year by the Supreme Court when the trial court passed sentence upon receipt of private reports without allowing the defendant or his counsel to learn of the representations in the reports and have a hearing to present evidence to refute such representations. Kuhl v. District Court, 139 M 536, 366 P2d 347 (1961).

Degree Presumed Correct:

Under former law, when the judgment was silent as to the degree of burglary of which the defendant was convicted and the sentence imposed was such as might be imposed for first degree burglary only, the Supreme Court would presume, when no appeal was taken, that the trial court ascertained that the defendant was guilty of burglary in the first degree. State ex rel. Williams v. Henry, 119 M 271, 174 P2d 220 (1946).

Under former law, in the absence of testimony it was presumed on appeal that the trial court in a burglary case had evidence before it justifying a finding that, if guilty at all, the defendant was guilty of an attempt to commit burglary in the nighttime, which constituted the first degree of the offense, and that the punishment inflicted was proper. St. v. Mish, 36 M 168, 92 P 459 (1907).

Lack of Agreement as to Grounds for Retrial: When on appeal in a homicide case three of the Justices of the Supreme Court, a majority, are of the opinion that the trial court committed error resulting in the denial of a fair trial to the defendant but are unable to agree as to any one of the grounds urged by him in his assignment of errors being sufficient to warrant a reversal of the judgment, a retrial will be ordered. Under such circumstances it is immaterial that the majority do not agree as to any particular error set forth in his assignment of errors—a mere procedural requirement—the real question being whether or not the defendant had a fair trial. St. v. Le Duc, 89 M 545, 300 P 919 (1931).

Reduction of Degree of Offense: Under former law, the Supreme Court had the power to reduce a verdict of murder in the first degree to make it fit the crime established by the evidence, murder in the second degree. St. v. Gunn, 89 M 453, 300 P 212 (1931).

Review of Ruling on Motion for New Trial: Upon an appeal from an order granting or denying a motion for a new trial, the Supreme Court sits as a court of error and review, not as a court of original jurisdiction or as an appellate court that is clothed with authority to try the motion de novo. St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919).

Modification of Judgment — Costs of Prosecution: A judgment of conviction for a crime that erroneously included payment by the defendant of the costs of prosecution is not on that account void as a whole, but it may be modified by striking therefrom the provision as to costs and, as so modified, be allowed to stand. St. v. Stone, 40 M 88, 105 P 89 (1909).

Case Notes

Remand or Order to Lift Stay Unnecessary Upon Affirmation by Appellate Court — Supreme Court Jurisdiction of Municipal Court Appeal Affirmed but Remanded by District Court: A Municipal Court sentenced Costa for misdemeanor traffic offenses, then stayed imposition of sentence pending Costa's appeal to District Court. The District Court affirmed judgment and remanded to the Municipal Court for imposition of sentence. The question then arose as to whether the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to address the District Court's decision. The Supreme Court noted that the definition of remand is to send something back for further action; however, the Legislature did not intend to require an appellate court to formally remand in cases involving affirmed criminal judgments. In addition, it is unnecessary for an appellate court to direct that a stay pending appeal be lifted once a defendant has exhausted the right to appeal and the underlying judgment and sentence have been affirmed. Therefore, the District Court's remand was premature, unnecessary, and of no immediate consequence and had no effect on the Municipal Court's final judgment and sentence. The Municipal Court stayed Costa's sentence pending appeal, which presumably encompassed an appeal to the Supreme Court, so because the District Court's remand was unnecessary, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction over Costa's appeal. Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006).

Mandate on Remand Binding: When the Supreme Court reversed the conviction of the defendant and remanded the case to the District Court with directions that, if the defendant had a new trial, the District Court should first make inquiry into the defendant's insanity but, if the prosecution was dismissed, the District Court should deliver the defendant to the court of another county which had continuing jurisdiction over the defendant so that the latter court could inquire into his mental condition and make such disposition of the defendant as is required by law, and thereafter the prosecution was dismissed, the trial court then was compelled to deliver the defendant to the other District Court and the County Attorney could not file a new information. The trial court was bound to follow the mandate of the Supreme Court as found in the remittitur and mandamus will lie to require that the District Court follow such mandate. State ex rel. Kitchens v. District Court, 130 M 57, 294 P2d 907 (1956). (Dissenting opinion, 130 M 57, 294 P2d 907 (1956).)

Supreme Court's Loss of Jurisdiction: When the Supreme Court reversed a conviction and the remittitur went down in due course and was filed with the lower court, the Supreme Court at that time lost jurisdiction in the case. Specifically it lost any jurisdiction it may have had theretofore to alter in any particular either the opinion or the mandate which followed upon that opinion, certainly unless the remittitur was first recalled. State ex rel. Kitchens v. District Court, 130 M 57, 294 P2d 907 (1956).

Dismissal of Amended Information — Retrial Under Original Information: A defendant was convicted of aiding and abetting another in witness tampering and aggravated assault. The conviction was reversed. The defendant was rearraigned on the original charges and convicted of lesser included offenses. The defendant alleged the filing of an amended information left the original information of no effect. He argued that when the amended information was dismissed there was no information then existing and that he was thereafter illegally detained. The Supreme Court disagreed, saying then when an unauthorized or otherwise improper amended information is quashed or dismissed, further proceedings may be had on the original information. St. v. Cardwell, 191 M 539, 625 P2d 553, 38 St. Rep. 451 (1981), following St. v. Thompson, 392 S. W. 2d 617 (Mo. 1965).

Double Jeopardy — Remand Order Not Required to Specify New Trial: A defendant was convicted of aiding and abetting another in witness tampering and aggravated assault. The conviction was reversed, and the defendant was rearraigned on the original charges. The defendant was convicted of lesser included offenses. On appeal, the defendant alleged double jeopardy. He argued that the failure to order specifically and expressly a new trial precluded further action. A remand order need not order a new trial for one to occur. The remand order in this case was supported by the opinion of the Supreme Court, which stated that in ordering dismissal the court did not mean to preclude a refiling of charges. On review, the Supreme Court said it was clear its intention was to leave the door open to retrial, and accordingly a new trial was granted. Therefore, the defendant's double jeopardy rights were not violated by his second trial. St. v. Cardwell, 191 M 539, 625 P2d 553, 38 St. Rep. 451 (1981).

CHAPTER 21 POSTCONVICTION HEARING

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Chapter Case Notes

Postconviction Relief — Newly Discovered Evidence Requirement Not Met — Ineffective Assistance of Appellate Counsel Alleged. Crabtree v. St., 2022 MT 133, 409 Mont. 211, 512 P.3d 1187.

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Standard for Determining Prejudice: To bring a successful claim for ineffective assistance of counsel, a petitioner must prove that counsel's actions or omissions were both unreasonable and prejudicial to the petitioner's defense. In proving prejudice, a petitioner is not required to show that but for counsel's actions the result of the trial would have been different. Instead, prejudice is sufficiently proven if the petitioner is able to show that absent counsel's actions there was a reasonable probability that the result of the trial would have been different. Wilkes v. St., 2015 MT 243, 380 Mont. 388, 355 P.3d 755.

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Strategic Decision of Counsel Unreasonable — First Prong of Strickland Test Met: Following his conviction of deliberate homicide for causing his infant son's death by inflicting abusive head trauma on the infant, the defendant petitioned for postconviction relief, arguing that his trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance of counsel by failing to prepare a challenge to the state expert's abusive head trauma diagnosis. In determining that counsel's actions were strategic and entitled to a presumption of reasonableness under the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel, the District Court concluded that counsel's obligation to prepare a challenge to the abusive head trauma diagnosis was discharged when he consulted one expert who returned the same diagnosis as the state's expert. The District Court also cited counsel's success in his last five trials in the judicial district that resulted in an acquittal or hung jury as entitling counsel's actions to a presumption of reasonableness. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed, concluding that neither of the reasons the District Court provided measured the reasonableness of counsel's decision in light of the circumstances of the defendant's case. Wilkes v. St., 2015 MT 243, 380 Mont. 388, 355 P.3d 755.

Appellate Counsel Effective — No Claims Against Trial Counsel on Direct Appeal: Because the defendant's claims against his trial counsel lacked merit, the defendant could not claim that his appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to raise ineffectiveness claims against his trial counsel. Miller v. St., 2012 MT 131, 365 Mont. 264, 280 P.3d 272.

Failure of Counsel to Move for Dismissal or Reduced Charges Based on Lack of Physical Evidence — Record-Based Claim Subject to Postconviction Review: Taylor contended on appeal that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for dismissal or reduction of a rape charge based on the absence of rape examination evidence. However, the record showed no explanation of the reasons for counsel's omissions. Therefore, consideration of the issue was not appropriate for direct appeal, but rather was best suited for postconviction review. The Supreme Court declined to address why counsel chose to proceed as he did and dismissed Taylor's appeal of this issue without prejudice. St. v. Taylor, 2010 MT 94, 356 Mont. 167, 231 P.3d 79.

No Evidence of Prejudicial State Involvement in Parole Proceedings — Postconviction Petition Properly Denied: As part of a plea agreement, the state agreed to not involve itself in Maldonado's parole proceedings. Maldonado contended that the state breached the plea agreement when the County Attorney sent a letter to the Board of Pardons and Parole recommending against Maldonado's parole. The District Court concluded that the state's action was harmless, and on appeal the Supreme Court agreed. Although the Board did receive the County Attorney's letter and one Board member met with a Deputy County Attorney, the state withdrew the letter of opposition, and the Board member who met with the Deputy County Attorney recused herself. Maldonado failed to present any evidence that the state's actions figured into the decision of the Board of Pardons and Parole or that Maldonado was prejudiced in any way, and the District Court did not err in denying Maldonado's request for postconviction relief on this issue. Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P.3d 1043 (2008).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Alleging Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Filed in District Court — Immunity of Attorney Assisting in Proceedings — Gillham Clarified: At the time of the decision in In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P.2d 1100 (1985), petitions for postconviction relief were addressed to the Supreme Court. Because the postconviction procedure has changed, pursuant to 46-21-105, petitions for postconviction relief are now initially filed in District Court. Thus, the Supreme Court clarified that petitions for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel may now be filed in the District Court where the postconviction proceeding is pending. The court affirmed that an attorney ordered to respond to a Gillham order issued by a District Court is not subject to a disciplinary proceeding before the Commission on Practice or subject to charges of malpractice. The immunity extends to all information, testimony, or documents necessarily provided in response to the allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel. Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007).

Boot Camp Confessions — No Classic Penalty Situation Compelling Self-Incriminating Statements: Woods volunteered for boot camp. A qualification for successful completion of the camp was full disclosure of past crimes in order to receive a sentence reduction. Unsuccessful completion of boot camp required a return to prison. In an anger management class at boot camp and later to several other persons, Woods made self-incriminating statements regarding a prior double homicide, and Woods was subsequently arrested based on the statements. Woods asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney failed to raise the classic penalty situation to explain that use of his statements were violative of his right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court noted that the classic penalty situation did not apply because Woods volunteered for boot camp and volunteered the statements. However, the statements were uncoerced, so the information upon which the state relied for its homicide investigation was not compelled by any threat of penalty from the state, and because no classic penalty situation existed, Woods could not argue ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to argue that it did. Woods did not invoke self-incrimination protection at boot camp, and the privilege against self-incrimination could not be considered self-executing. Thus, Woods's petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. St. v. Woods, 2005 MT 186, 328 M 54, 117 P3d 152 (2005), following St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and distinguishing Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Counsel's Act or Omission Not Considered Trial Strategy Reviewable on Direct Appeal: Lucero contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not adequately explain the nature and terms of the state's plea bargain offer. Applying the Strickland test for ineffective assistance claims, the Supreme Court noted that before an ineffective assistance claim will be considered on direct appeal, the record must adequately document the reason why counsel acted in a particular manner, and if the record does not supply the reason, the claim is more appropriately raised in a petition for postconviction relief. However, the claimed act or omission in this case was not considered trial strategy because counsel's communication of the oral plea offer to Lucero was obligatory, not strategic. Thus, the question was not why counsel acted in a particular manner but whether counsel acted and, if so, whether counsel acted adequately, and review of an obligatory action may be reviewed on direct appeal. Lucero was fully informed of the offer and chose to go to trial anyway. Counsel's conduct in communicating the plea offer did not fall below the standard of reasonable representation. Lucero's claim failed to meet the first prong of the Strickland test and was properly denied. St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004). See also Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674 (1997), St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001), and St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003).

Admission by Counsel That Defendant Resisted Arrest When Defendant Charged With Assaulting Peace Officer — Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Audet was charged with assaulting a peace officer and resisting arrest. At the time of trial, Audet told the court that he wished to plead guilty to the resisting arrest charge but to go to trial on the assault charge, even though his attorney had advised otherwise. The court entered not guilty pleas for both counts. Counsel informed the jury in opening and closing statements that Audet was not contesting the resisting arrest charge, but lacked the purposeful and knowing elements required to commit officer assault. The prosecutor then convinced the jury that Audet had essentially conceded the mental state by conceding guilt for resisting arrest, and Audet was convicted on both counts. On appeal, Audet contended that counsel's conduct constituted ineffective assistance, warranting reversal. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test and dismissed the claim. The record did not reveal why counsel chose to concede the resisting arrest charge to the jury, so the court was unable to determine whether the decision constituted an unreasonable defense strategy that would overcome the presumption that counsel's actions fell within the range of reasonable professional conduct. Pursuant to St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), Audet's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice to the ineffective assistance issue being raised in a postconviction relief proceeding. St. v. Audet, 2004 MT 224, 322 M 415, 96 P3d 1144 (2004). See also St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 223, 317 M 177, 75 P3d 1268 (2003), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Appointed Counsel — No Ineffective Assistance of in Postconviction Relief Proceedings: Kallowat contended that he received ineffective assistance from his appointed counsel who failed to represent him in postconviction relief proceedings and to follow Kallowat's instruction to file an appeal in federal court. The Supreme Court disagreed. Kallowat was appointed two different attorneys, one of whom withdrew because of an excessive workload, and another who withdrew citing no discernible basis entitling Kallowat to relief, so Kallowat was allowed to proceed pro se. There was no error in allowing counsel to withdraw. Further, attorneys in criminal cases are required to represent a client only until final judgment is rendered, including appeals to the Montana Supreme Court, so counsel was not required to represent Kallowat in appealing to the federal courts. Thus, Kallowat's argument that he did not receive effective assistance of counsel failed. Kallowat v. St., 2004 MT 152, 321 M 501, 92 P3d 1176 (2004).

Actual Innocence Standard Applied to Postconviction Claim Based on Incomplete DNA Results at Trial — Burden of Postconviction Statute of Limitations Met: Pope's petition for postconviction relief was denied by the District Court as barred by the 5-year statute of limitations in the 1993 version of 46-21-102 (now 1 year) and because the issues were not raised on direct appeal. The court concluded that the jurisdictional bar could be overcome only by a clear miscarriage of justice and that the exception did not apply unless Pope did not commit the offense. The court relied on an inadmissible confession that Pope committed the crime, reasoning that even if the confession was not admissible at trial, it could be considered in a postconviction proceeding because it refuted Pope's claim of innocence. Pope contended that the exception applied because newly available DNA evidence tended to show that he did not commit the crime. The Supreme Court reversed. Based on Murray v. Carrier, 477 US 478 (1986), a petitioner must demonstrate that a constitutional violation at trial has probably resulted in conviction of an individual who is actually innocent and the claim must be supported by new evidence that indicates that the individual is innocent. Montana case law provides that the miscarriage of justice must be so obvious that the judgment is rendered a complete nullity and that the exception does not apply unless the defendant did not commit the crime from which relief is sought. Further, under Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), actual innocence requires that no reasonable, properly instructed juror would have found the defendant guilty. Schlup also allows review only of the record and new evidence to determine what a reasonable juror would find, so the District Court improperly relied on the failed plea confession to determine that Pope was not actually innocent. Pope correctly pointed out that the use of "and/or" language in the jury instructions made it impossible to determine whether Pope was convicted of raping one or two women. Thus, Pope satisfied the Schlup actual innocence burden in light of the complete DNA report, and when coupled with the error of using "and/or" language in the alternative charge, the jury instructions, and the verdict, waiver of the time bar in 46-21-102 was required by the clear miscarriage of justice, warranting reversal. St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P3d 1232 (2003). See also St. v. Beach, 2013 MT 130, 370 Mont. 163, 302 P.3d 47.

Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Voir Dire Dismissed on Direct Appeal — Chastain Overruled: Following a felony DUI conviction, Herrman appealed, claiming ineffective assistance of counsel during voir dire. Counsel failed to remove several jurors for cause, but later removed the jurors by peremptory challenge, effectively causing the loss of peremptory challenges to which Herrman was entitled. The Supreme Court noted that jury impartiality goes to the very integrity of the justice system and that the presence of even one juror who cannot fairly assess the credibility of witnesses must be presumed prejudicial and result in reversal. Herrman cited St. v. Chastain, 285 M 61, 947 P2d 57 (1997), for the proposition that ineffective assistance occurred because counsel failed to develop information in the record demonstrating an individual juror's bias and to exercise challenges for cause against those jurors expressing bias. However, the Supreme Court overruled Chastain because it was a mistake to determine that counsel was ineffective during voir dire based on the lack of a reason apparent on the record. Although lawyers will state their reasons on the record for challenging a juror for cause, they do not state their reasons for not challenging a juror. Herrman's lawyer might have had tactical reasons for not challenging certain jurors for cause, but those reasons were not on the record, so the Supreme Court could not address Herrman's ineffective assistance claims without considering matters outside the record. Contentions based on matters outside the record are more appropriately raised in a petition for postconviction relief. Thus, Herrman's direct appeal was dismissed to allow a petition for postconviction relief that could address why counsel did not challenge certain jurors for cause. St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), followed in St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003), and, with regard to lack of a record regarding defense counsel's trial tactics as necessitating a postconviction hearing in lieu of direct appeal, in St. v. Henderson, 2003 MT 285, 318 M 31, 78 P3d 848 (2003). Herrman was also followed in St. v. Olsen, 2004 MT 158, 322 M 1, 92 P3d 1204 (2004). See also St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001), St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed With Supreme Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Amend Pleadings on Remand: Boucher filed with the Supreme Court for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court remanded to District Court for an evidentiary hearing on whether Boucher was denied effective assistance of counsel because of counsel's failure to investigate and formulate a defense based on the victim's history of making false accusations of sexual assault. On remand, Boucher sought to offer additional evidence of ineffective counsel unrelated to the issue remanded. Although a District Court has the discretion to grant or deny a motion to amend a postconviction petition when the petition is filed with that court, in cases like this when the petition is originally filed with the Supreme Court and remanded, the District Court does not have authority to grant leave to amend the pleadings to include allegations not included in the original petition. St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), distinguishing Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997), and Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

"Motion to Vacate Conviction" Construed as Motion for Postconviction Relief and Not Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Attorney Conflict of Interests — Petition Previously Denied: Howard filed a motion for postconviction relief in 1993, asserting that his attorney in his 1981 trial for felony theft had a conflict of interests because the attorney also represented a codefendant. The Supreme Court denied his petition as time-barred under 46-21-102. Howard then filed with the District Court a "Motion to Vacate Conviction", which the District Court construed as another petition for postconviction relief and also denied as time-barred. The Supreme Court held that it was proper for the District Court to construe the "Motion to Vacate Conviction" as another motion for postconviction relief. Despite Howard's argument that his motion did not meet the formal prerequisites for a motion for postconviction relief and that motions to withdraw a guilty plea are allowed after judgment by virtue of 46-16-105, the Supreme Court held: (1) that it had not always strictly enforced the requirements for a motion for postconviction relief, especially for persons appearing pro se; (2) that the content of Howard's motion was of the type usually made in motions for postconviction relief; and (3) that although other means of review of a sentence other than postconviction relief may sometimes be necessary because of exigent circumstances, the circumstances of Howard's situation, in which he waited over 10 years to challenge his conviction the first time, did not demonstrate those exigent circumstances. The Supreme Court held that this petition, like Howard's first petition for postconviction relief, was time-barred by 46-21-101. St. v. Howard, 282 M 522, 938 P2d 710, 54 St. Rep. 464 (1997).

Denial of Appeal Allowed When Right to Postconviction Relief Exercised — No Due Process Violation Found: Finney argued on appeal that he had been denied his right to effective assistance of counsel. Citing Evitts v. Lucey, 469 US 387 (1985), the Supreme Court held that when, as in this case, a criminal defendant was afforded a remedy in postconviction proceedings that have already been reviewed under a different part of the Supreme Court's opinion, there is no violation of the defendant's due process rights in denial of appeal. St. v. Finney, 281 M 58, 931 P2d 1300, 54 St. Rep. 58 (1997), distinguished in Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Failure to Give Mandatory Accomplice Jury Instruction — Harmless Error — Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In petitioner's trial on the charge of attempted deliberate homicide, his lawyer withdrew a previous request, in a jury instruction mandated by 26-1-303, that testimony of an accomplice must be viewed with distrust. Petitioner's theory of defense was that his alleged accomplices had fabricated their testimony. The judge did instruct the jury that testimony of accomplices must be corroborated. In a proceeding for postconviction relief, the Supreme Court ruled that the court's failure to give the mandatory instruction was harmless error and that the withdrawal by petitioner's lawyer of the request for the mandatory instruction was not ineffective assistance of counsel under Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984). In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100, 42 St. Rep. 1508 (1985).

Action for Postconviction Relief Exclusive Means of Establishing District Court Jurisdiction to Modify Sentence: Once a valid sentence has been pronounced by a District Court, that court lacks jurisdiction to modify the sentence upon postjudgment motion by the defendant. The District Court can only modify the sentence if the defendant files a motion for postconviction relief under Title 46, ch. 21. To reduce duplication of effort, the Supreme Court considered defendant's postjudgment motion to be a motion for postconviction relief. Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985), followed in St. v. George, 224 M 495, 730 P2d 412, 43 St. Rep. 2363 (1986), In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988), and in St. v. Fertterer, 260 M 397, 860 P2d 151, 50 St. Rep. 1135 (1993).

Motion Filed After Notice of Appeal — Treated as Petition for Postconviction Relief: A motion to withdraw a guilty plea that was filed after a notice of appeal had been filed was treated as a petition for postconviction relief under this chapter because the notice of appeal had removed jurisdiction from the District Court. St. v. Laverdure, 212 M 31, 685 P2d 375, 41 St. Rep. 1570 (1984).

State Immune From Suit for Illegal Imprisonment When Imprisonment Later Declared Contrary to Statute: In 1979, petitioner was convicted of issuing a bad check. Her sentence was deferred, and she was placed on probation for 3 years. In 1982, petitioner's deferral was revoked because she was convicted of another crime. As a result of the revocation, she was sentenced to serve 5 years in prison. Later in 1982, the Supreme Court, relying on its interpretation of 53-30-105 (as it read prior to its amendment in 1981) (now repealed) in Crist v. Segna, 191 M 210, 622 P2d 1028, 38 St. Rep. 150 (1981), ordered petitioner's release because at the time of her imprisonment she had accumulated sufficient good time credit on probation that her deferred sentence would have been fully served. Petitioner then sued for damages for illegal imprisonment. The Supreme Court held that the State was immune from suit under 2-9-112 because the sentence imposed on petitioner for her violation of probation was a judicial act. Knutson v. St., 211 M 126, 683 P2d 488, 41 St. Rep. 1258 (1984).

District Judge Who Had Represented Petitioners in Same Criminal Case — Disqualification Required: A petition for postconviction relief was filed in the District Court before a judge who, 7 years earlier, had been involved as defense counsel in the preliminary stages of the criminal prosecution. The petition was denied, and petitioners appealed. The Supreme Court ruled that the District Judge had committed error in not disqualifying himself. The case was remanded for a postconviction hearing before another District Judge. St. v. Hintz, 205 M 295, 667 P2d 434, 40 St. Rep. 1280 (1983).

Fully and Finally Litigated Issues Not Considered: An issue that has been fully and finally litigated in the proceeding leading to the judgment of the conviction will not be relitigated in postconviction hearings. An issue is considered fully and finally litigated when the Supreme Court of this state has ruled on the merits of the question. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981).

Applicability of Postconviction Procedure to Capital Convictions Following Automatic Sentence Review: A defendant sentenced to death is entitled to an automatic sentence review under 46-18-307, et seq. This automatic review does not stand in the place of postconviction relief, and after the automatic review, a defendant may petition for postconviction relief under Title 46, ch. 21. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981); Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Competence of Trial Judge to Preside Over Petition When He May Be Called as Witness: Coleman argued that the sentencing judge would likely be called to testify in his hearing for postconviction relief and the sentencing judge should therefore recuse himself as presiding judge over his petition for postconviction relief. Coleman never made clear what testimony he hoped to elicit from the District Judge. The Supreme Court is of the view that the postconviction court judge should only recuse himself if the petitioner shows that the judge is the source of material evidence otherwise unobtainable. A trial judge's familiarity with a case does not automatically make him a material witness in postconviction proceedings. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Remedy Civil in Nature: Montana's postconviction remedy contained in Title 46, ch. 21, is civil in nature and independent of the criminal action. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Res Judicata — When Previously Litigated Issues Barred: Res judicata cannot be applied in such a manner as to deprive Coleman of the right to file a postconviction petition and to use postconviction procedure. However, res judicata can be used to bar the rehearing of issues already litigated if: (1) the same ground presented in the subsequent application was determined adversely to the applicant on the prior application; (2) the prior determination was on the merits; and (3) the ends of justice would not be served by reaching the merits of the subsequent application. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981), following Sanders v. U.S., 373 US 1, 10 L Ed 2d 148, 83 S Ct 1068 (1963), and followed in St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268, 45 St. Rep. 1192 (1988), and in Walker v. McCormick, 260 M 301, 858 P2d 373, 50 St. Rep. 1053 (1993).

Newly Discovered Evidence of Innocence: Its History and Future Treatment in Montana, Phillips, 76 Mont. L. Rev. 327 (2015).

Part 1 Initiating Proceedings

Part Case Notes

Failure to Adequately Address Newly Discovered Evidence Claim: The District Court failed to adequately address the defendant's newly discovered evidence claim when it made no specific conclusions regarding the claim and did not identify the legal standard required for the defendant to succeed on the claim. Therefore, on appeal, the Supreme Court remanded the defendant's newly discovered evidence claim to the District Court to apply the standard stated in 46-21-102 and independently consider and rule on the claim. Wilkes v. St., 2015 MT 243, 380 Mont. 388, 355 P.3d 755.

Failure of Counsel to Object to Introduction of Inconsistent Prior Statements on Confrontation Grounds Not Considered Ineffective Assistance: Jenkins was convicted of deliberate homicide, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery after having been implicated in the crimes based in part on statements made to police and at trial by his wife, Mary. Mary suffered from dementia related to Alzheimer's disease and periodic memory lapses. As a result, in some pretrial interviews, she answered questions with declarative statements while in other interviews, even when asked the same or similar questions, she responded that she didn't know or couldn't remember. Nevertheless, at a pretrial hearing, it was determined that she knew the difference between truth and falsity, could express herself in court, and was competent to testify. At trial, she exhibited the same behavior. On direct examination, the prosecutor asked many of the same questions asked during the pretrial interviews, and although she answered some questions definitively, most of her testimony was that she didn't know or couldn't remember. On cross-examination, she often retracted the definitive answers she gave on direct examination, saying again that she could not remember. Following her testimony, the trial court allowed the prosecution to introduce the content of Mary's pretrial interviews through the testimony of the interviewing officers pursuant to the prior inconsistent statement exception to the hearsay rule, as set out in Rule 801(d)(1)(A), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). Jenkins objected on evidentiary grounds, but not on confrontation grounds, so the issue was not preserved for appeal. In a petition for postconviction relief, Jenkins claimed that he was denied effective assistance of counsel because his attorney should have objected on confrontation grounds. The District Court denied the petition, holding that there was no confrontation clause violation and that even if the objection had been made, it would not have affected the outcome of the trial. Jenkins then appealed the denial of the petition for postconviction relief. The state contended that Jenkins' right to confront witnesses was satisfied by his opportunity to cross-examine Mary and demonstrate to the jury her poor and unreliable memory. The Supreme Court concurred. The implications of admitting prior inconsistent statements was addressed in Calif. v. Green, 399 US 149 (1970), in which it was held that the confrontation clause is not violated by admitting a declarant's out-of-court statements as long as the declarant is testifying as a witness and is subject to full and effective cross-examination. Further, under U.S. v. Owens, 484 US 554 (1988), the confrontation clause guarantees only an opportunity for effective cross-examination, not cross-examination that is effective in a way that the defendant might wish. Even though Mary suffered from memory lapses, she was competent, appeared at trial, and was subjected to unrestricted cross-examination, giving Jenkins ample opportunity to demonstrate her inability to recall past events and giving the jury the opportunity to observe her testimony and judge the reliability of her memory as it pertained to both her in-court and out-of-court statements. Jenkins failed to show that an objection on confrontation grounds would have been sustained, therefore failing to demonstrate that his defense was prejudiced by his trial counsel's failure to preserve the issue for appeal. Jenkins was thus not denied effective assistance of counsel and his petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. St. v. Jenkins, 2001 MT 79, 305 M 95, 23 P3d 201 (2001).

46-21-101. When validity of sentence may be challenged.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Established procedure has assumed that the proper place for filing a challenge to a lower court sentence is in the District Court of the same county. Subsection (2) merely puts this practice into statute form. Subsection (3) is derived from the first sentence of 46-21-103. The Commission felt that the occasion for filing of a postconviction petition directly in the Supreme Court would be very rare. However, the Supreme Court preferred not to eliminate this option completely but preferred to restrict it to cases in which the petitioner is in custody.

Uniform State Law — Note on Commission Comments: The following states have enacted the Uniform Post-Conviction Procedure Act: Arkansas, Idaho, Iowa, Maryland, Minnesota, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, and South Dakota.

The commission comments summarize the Uniform Commission Comments and distinguish Montana changes to the U.P.C.A., thus the Uniform Commission Comments are not set forth.

Source: Uniform Post-conviction Procedure Act, section 1.

This section defines the scope of the remedy and is similar to the one provided for by the federal statute, 28 U.S.C. 2255. The aim of this section is to bring together and consolidate into one simple statute all the remedies, beyond those that are incident to the usual procedures of trial and review, which are at present available for challenging the validity of a sentence of imprisonment. This section has attempted to provide an expeditious remedy without violating Article I, Section 9 of the U.S. Constitution, and similar provisions in the state constitution [Montana Constitution, Article II, section 19], that: "The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended . . ." This has been effected by providing a single remedy which does not restrict a prisoner's rights of collateral attack, which preserves and simplifies the procedures under the writ of coram nobis, and which affords a remedy in lieu of, and fully as broad as habeas corpus.

The scope of the post-conviction remedy is more expansive than the Uniform Post Conviction Act or any post-conviction remedy heretofore enacted or proposed by any state. Because, by this petition anybody adjudged guilty of an offense in a court of record, even though not incarcerated, may attack the validity of his conviction.

Compiler's Comments

1997 Amendment: Chapter 378 in (1), near end after "imposed the sentence", deleted "or the supreme court"; in (2), at end of first sentence, inserted "may not be filed unless the petitioner has exhausted all appeal remedies provided by law"; deleted (3) that read: "(3) If the person is in custody, the person may elect to file the petition directly with the supreme court"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1997.

Severability: Section 8, Ch. 378, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 9(1), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "Except as provided in subsection (2), [sections 3 through 6] [amending 46-21-101, 46-21-102, 46-21-105, and 46-21-201] apply to proceedings in which the conviction becomes final:

(a) after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]; or

(b) during the 12 months prior to [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997] if a petition under Title 46, chapter 21, is filed within the 12 months after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]."

1991 Amendment: Inserted (2) concerning District Court in which petition must be filed; inserted (3) concerning direct filing with Supreme Court; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendment: Near middle inserted "that a suspended or deferred sentence was improperly revoked"; and at end inserted "or revocation order".

1981 Amendment: Deleted "or any justice of the supreme court" following "the supreme court" near the end of the section.

Postconviction Relief — Newly Discovered Evidence Requirement Not Met — Ineffective Assistance of Appellate Counsel Alleged. Crabtree v. St., 2022 MT 133, 409 Mont. 211, 512 P.3d 1187.

Victim's Testimony Following Brother's Conviction Not Credible — No Evidence of Actual Innocence — Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief Proper: The defendant pleaded guilty to attempted mitigated deliberate homicide for running over his brother with a vehicle as the brother rode away on a bicycle. The defendant received the maximum sentence. After an unsuccessful attempt to withdraw his plea, the defendant filed a petition for postconviction relief and alleged that he had newly discovered evidence of his innocence. At a hearing, the victim testified that he had possibly swerved in front of his brother; however, other eyewitnesses testified that the victim had not. Ultimately, the District Court denied the defendant's petition for postconviction relief, holding that the victim's testimony was not credible, newly discovered evidence and did not demonstrate actual innocence. Guillen v. St., 2018 MT 71, 391 Mont. 131, 415 P.3d 1.

Failure to Adequately Address Newly Discovered Evidence Claim: The District Court failed to adequately address the defendant's newly discovered evidence claim when it made no specific conclusions regarding the claim and did not identify the legal standard required for the defendant to succeed on the claim. Therefore, on appeal, the Supreme Court remanded the defendant's newly discovered evidence claim to the District Court to apply the standard stated in 46-21-102 and independently consider and rule on the claim. Wilkes v. St., 2015 MT 243, 380 Mont. 388, 355 P.3d 755.

Condition of Written Sentence Inconsistent With Oral Pronouncement — Written Judgment Increasing Sentence Invalid: The Supreme Court reversed a written sentence requiring the defendant to attend self-help meetings when the oral sentence had allowed the probation officer the discretion to determine whether or not the defendant was to attend self-help meetings, the District Court had explicitly stated that it was making the modification at the oral pronouncement, and the District Court had noted its intention to alter the language. St. v. Pulst, 2015 MT 184, 379 Mont. 494, 351 P.3d 687.

Life Sentence for Juvenile Offender Upheld — Miller v. Alabama Is Procedural Rule — Not Substantive — Not Watershed Procedural — Not Retroactive on Collateral Review: In 1984, petitioner was sentenced to the maximum sentence of 100 years' imprisonment for a deliberate homicide that was committed when he was age 17. Twenty-eight years later, the U.S. Supreme Court held in Miller v. Alabama, 567 US 460, 132 S Ct 2455 (2012), that: (1) mandated life incarceration without the possibility of parole for a juvenile offender is unconstitutional; and (2) a sentencer must follow a certain process before imposing a life without the possibility of parole sentence on a juvenile. In light of Miller, petitioner, in a habeas corpus proceeding, argued that his sentence is equal to life without parole and unconstitutional given that his sentencer did not consider how age counseled against his sentence. After concluding that the sentencing consideration rule is a new rule, subject to the general rule of nonretroactivity, the Supreme Court declined to apply an exception and label the rule as a substantive rule or a watershed procedural rule. Instead, the court determined that Miller is a procedural rule that is not retroactive on collateral review and it did not reach the merits in the case. Beach v. St., 2015 MT 118, 379 Mont. 74, 348 P.3d 629.

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Failure to Object to Hearsay Testimony Could Have Been Tactical Decision: A defendant who was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent claimed that he received ineffective assistance of counsel due to his counsel's failure to object to hearsay testimony that allegedly bolstered the victim's credibility. On appeal, the Supreme Court was unable to determine from the record why the defendant's attorney did not object, but other objections were made by the attorney and it was plausible that failure to object was a tactical strategic decision. Consequently, the ineffective assistance of counsel claim was dismissed without prejudice. St. v. Aker, 2013 MT 253, 371 Mont. 491, 310 P.3d 506, followed in St. v. Ugalde, 2013 MT 308, 372 Mont. 234, 311 P.3d 772.

Failure to Question Witnesses at Sentencing or Present Alternative Sentencing Recommendation — No Ineffective Assistance: After being convicted of incest, the defendant refused to cooperate in the presentencing investigation process. At the sentencing hearing, the defendant's counsel did not cross-examine the state's witnesses, offer any witnesses on the defendant's behalf, or offer an alternative sentencing recommendation. The District Court imposed a harsher sentence than recommended by the state and did not suspend any of the defendant's sentence. The defendant asserted that he had been denied effective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not subject the state's case at sentencing to meaningful adversarial testing and did not make an alternative sentencing recommendation. Analyzing the defendant's claim under the second prong of the Strickland test, the Supreme Court held that the defendant was not prejudiced by his attorney's performance. The defendant suggested no possible questions that his trial counsel should have asked the witnesses at the sentencing hearing, did not offer any witnesses who should have been called on his behalf, and refused to participate in the presentencing investigation, forgoing the opportunity to explain the information provided in the presentence report. Finally, the District Court detailed a number of bases to support a sentence in excess of the mandatory minimum, and the Supreme Court held that because there was not a reasonable probability that the District Court would have imposed a less severe sentence had the defendant's counsel offered an alternative recommendation, the defendant received effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Peart, 2012 MT 274, 367 Mont. 153, 290 P.3d 706.

Claim of Ineffective Assistance for Not Seeking Lesser Included Offense — Issues for Postconviction Relief Proceeding Based on Insufficient Record: After the defendant was convicted of attempted sexual intercourse without consent, he claimed that he received ineffective assistance of counsel given that his counsel did not seek a lesser included offense instruction. Citing St. v. Clary, 2012 MT 26, 364 Mont. 53, 270 P.3d 88, the Supreme Court determined that the record failed to provide a sufficient explanation for the actions of the defendant's counsel, and therefore the issues were deemed to be better examined within a postconviction relief proceeding. St. v.

Bishop, 2012 MT 259, 367 Mont. 10, 291 P.3d 538. See also St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 Mont. 58, 30 P.3d 340, and St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 Mont. 92, 167 P.3d 906.

District Court Failed to Reference Lack of Remorse In Record — Sentence Illegal: After the defendant was convicted of assault with a weapon, the District Court sentenced him to 20 years at Montana State Prison with no restriction on parole, based in part on the defendant's lack of remorse for the stabbing. Relying on St. v. Duncan, 2008 MT 148, 343 Mont. 220, 183 P.3d 111, the Supreme Court reversed the sentence and remanded for correction because in its sentence pronouncement, the District Court did not affirmatively point to any evidence in the record to support the finding of lack of remorse. St. v. Briscoe, 2012 MT 152, 365 Mont. 383, 282 P.3d 657.

Postconviction Proceedings — Recusal of Trial Judge — Right to Substitute Judge Available: A criminal defendant filed a petition for postconviction relief. The judge who presided over his trial and sentencing recused herself and the matter was transferred to another judge. The state filed a motion to substitute the new judge under 3-1-804, which was granted. The defendant appealed and argued that under 46-21-101, the right to substitute a judge does not apply to postconviction proceedings. After providing an extensive and entertaining history on the origins of the right to substitute a judge in civil cases in Montana, the Supreme Court agreed that a petition for postconviction relief must be filed in the same court that sentenced the defendant. However, the court also concluded that if that judge then recuses herself, the parties are entitled to substitute the new judge pursuant to 3-1-804. Patrick v. St., 2011 MT 169, 361 Mont. 204, 257 P.3d 365.

Prescription of Different Psychiatric Medicines Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment or Denial of Dignity: After Wilson was incarcerated at the Montana State Prison, he was prescribed two psychiatric drugs different from the three drugs that were originally prescribed to keep him psychiatrically stable. The District Court found that the reason for the denial was a professional difference of opinion between the prescribing physician and the prison psychiatrist as to the medical value of one of the drugs in a prison setting and that the prison had a policy not to allow the use of one of the originally prescribed drugs by prisoners because of its potential for abuse. Based upon a record of numerous hearings and much testimony, the Montana Supreme Court found that the prison had not deprived Wilson of one of the basic necessities of life and that the prison was not deliberately indifferent to Wilson's medical care or to the standards adopted by the Montana Supreme Court, based upon decisions by the U.S. Supreme Court, in Quigg v. Slaughter, 2007 MT 76, 336 Mont. 474, 154 P.3d 1217, and Walker v. St., 2003 MT 134, 316 Mont. 103, 68 P.3d 872. Wilson v. St., 2010 MT 278, 358 Mont. 438, 249 P.3d 28.

Illegal Revocation of Sentence — Habeas Corpus Relief Warranted: The state petitioned to revoke Borgen's suspended sentence, and the District Court granted the petition and resentenced Borgen to incarceration for an additional 14 years. Borgen petitioned for habeas corpus relief. The Supreme Court determined that after an illegal weapon enhancement sentence was subtracted from Borgen's original sentence, the total time remaining on Borgen's suspended sentence was about 9 years, 1 month. However, the petition to revoke the suspended sentence was not filed until 9 years, 8 months after sentencing. Because the legal portion of Borgen's sentence had expired before the petition to revoke was filed, revocation of Borgen's sentence was facially illegal, and Borgen's incarceration constituted a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice warranting habeas corpus relief. Therefore, the Supreme Court granted Borgen's petition, vacated the sentence revocation, and ordered that Borgen be released from custody. Borgen v. Sorrell, 2009 MT 143, 350 M 339, 217 P.3d 1022 (2009). See also Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P.3d 337 (2006).

What Constitutes Similarly Situated Case for Purposes of Retroactive Application of New Rule — Issue Required to Be Raised in Trial Court: As a general principle, in order for a case to be similarly situated for purposes of retroactive application of a newly announced rule, the issue addressed by the new rule should be raised by the movant at the trial court level and properly preserved for appeal. The only exception would be a challenge under the common-law plain error doctrine or if unique circumstances apply, such as those in St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P.3d 1001 (2005). Here, Foster-DeBerry contended that the new rule regarding suppression of telephone and transmission recordings announced in St. v. Goetz & St. v. Hamper, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P.3d 489 (2008), should retroactively apply to Foster-DeBerry's case, which was pending when the Goetz-Hamper rule was announced. However, Foster-DeBerry never filed a motion to suppress or raised the legal issues addressed in Goetz-Hamper in trial court, and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal, so Foster-DeBerry was not entitled to retroactive application of the Goetz-Hamper rule. Further, Foster-DeBerry did not argue for application of the plain error doctrine, so the Supreme Court declined to apply it. St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008

MT 397, 347 M 164, 197 P3d 1004 (2008), following Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 US 314 (1987), and St. v. Zivcic, 598 NW2d 565 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999).

Application for Extraordinary Relief From Montana Supreme Court Only Recourse for Defendant Who Wishes to Challenge Decision of the Sentence Review Division: The District Court lacked jurisdiction to review decisions of the Sentence Review Division because it is a division of the Montana Supreme Court. Jordan v. St., 2008 MT 334, 346 M 193, 194 P3d 657, (2008).

Defendant's Failure to Discover Alleged Error in Sentencing Process Until Time for Appeal Expired — Postconviction Proceeding Not Barred: Phillips sought postconviction relief on grounds that his tribal court juvenile record had been illegally requested by the state and incorporated into the presentence investigation report and sentencing proceedings in violation of due process. The state asserted that the matter could have been raised on direct appeal and was thus inappropriate for postconviction relief. However, by the time that Phillips discovered the alleged error, the time for appeal of his conviction had passed, so the Supreme Court held that the claim was not procedurally barred from postconviction consideration. St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Postconviction Claim That Counsel Failed to Investigate Case Properly Denied in Light of Voluntary Plea: After entering a nolo contendere plea on a sexual offense, Hardin filed a petition for postconviction relief, asserting that he received ineffective assistance because defense counsel failed to investigate the case prior to the plea. The petition was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that after voluntarily and knowingly entering a guilty plea, a defendant can challenge only the voluntary character of the plea. In this case, when Hardin entered the plea, he signed a plea agreement form and a plea of guilty and waiver of rights form, acknowledging that the plea was entered knowingly, that he understood that he was waiving his rights, and that he was satisfied with the attorney's services. Absent any allegation or evidence in the record that the plea was not entered voluntarily and knowingly, the postconviction claim of ineffective assistance of counsel was properly denied. Hardin v. St., 2006 MT 272, 334 M 204, 146 P3d 746 (2006), overruled in part in Gardiipee v. Salmonsens, 2021 MT 115, 404 Mont. 144, 486 P.3d 689, to the extent that Hardin fails to distinguish between an illegal sentence and an invalid plea.

Sentencing Judge to Preside Over Postconviction Proceedings: A District Court judge was substituted for the original judge early in Jordan's criminal proceedings and ultimately sentenced Jordan. When Jordan petitioned for postconviction relief, the original judge handled the proceedings and dismissed Jordan's petition. The Supreme Court held that the sentencing judge should preside over postconviction proceedings. Substitution of a trial judge does not suddenly evaporate in subsequent postconviction proceedings involving the same parties, witnesses, and factual background as the underlying case from which a judge was previously removed. In this case, the original judge's substitution in Jordan's criminal action also prevented the original judge from presiding over Jordan's postconviction proceedings. The postconviction claim was remanded for consideration by the sentencing judge. Jordan v. St., 2007 MT 165, 338 M 113, 162 P3d 863 (2007), following Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624 (1981). However, see Patrick v. St., 2011 MT 169, 361 Mont. 204, 257 P.3d 365 (holding that when the presiding judge recuses herself from postconviction proceedings, the parties may move to substitute the new judge pursuant to 3-1-804).

Only Record-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim on Appeal: Frasure claimed on appeal that her attorney provided ineffective assistance at trial by failing to object to the introduction of certain evidence. However, the Supreme Court will determine that there was ineffective assistance of counsel only if that conclusion can be based on the record on appeal or if there is no plausible justification for counsel's actions or inactions. Frasure failed to establish that her ineffective assistance claim was record-based, so the claim was dismissed without prejudice to the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 305, 323 M 479, 100 P3d 1013 (2004). See also St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003), St. v. Baker, 2013 MT 113, 370 Mont. 43, 300 P.3d 696, and St. v. Hinshaw, 2018 MT 49, 390 Mont. 372, 414 P.3d 271.

Person Pleading Guilty in Justice's Court Not Entitled to Appeal to District Court for Trial De Novo: Fyant pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to failure to provide proof of insurance and received a suspended sentence and a $350 fine with the understanding that all or part of the fine would be suspended upon a finding by the court of an inability to pay on the part of Fyant. Fyant offered proof of the inability to pay, but the Justice's Court made no finding regarding her ability to pay and refused to suspend the fines. Fyant filed an appeal with the District Court on the grounds that the sentence was illegal. The Supreme Court held that according to 46-17-203, a person who pleads guilty in Justice's Court waives the right of trial de novo and that Fyant failed to take advantage of the other methods of postconviction relief available to her. St. v. Fyant, 2004 MT 298, 323 M 408, 104 P3d 434 (2004).

Criteria of Effective Assistance of Defense Counsel — Prejudice From Ineffective Counsel Warranting Withdrawal of Alford Plea: In a petition for postconviction relief from a drug conviction, Henderson contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel and should be allowed to withdraw his Alford plea, but the District Court denied the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the Strickland test to determine whether Henderson's counsel was ineffective. The first part of the test requires that defendant show that counsel's performance was deficient. The overarching duty of a criminal defense counsel is to advocate on behalf of the defendant and to meet, test, and refute the prosecution's case. Henderson met the first Strickland requirement by showing that counsel performed no investigation, research, or analysis, filed no pretrial motions, and spent only 4 hours on the case, which included clerical work, appearing in court with Henderson on two occasions, and an hour persuading Henderson to plead guilty. The sum of counsel's actual legal work was asking the County Attorney to propose a plea bargain and then signing the prosecution's first offer. Counsel's utter failure to advocate for Henderson in a meaningful way constituted deficient performance. The second Strickland requirement is a showing by defendant of a reasonable probability that but for counsel's deficient performance, the result of the proceeding would have been different. Henderson also met this test by showing that the decision to enter the Alford plea was clearly influenced by counsel's lack of effective assistance and that, but for the ineffective assistance, he would not have entered the plea. Thus, the lack of effective assistance in this case constituted sufficient good cause to authorize Henderson to withdraw the Alford plea and proceed to trial. The Supreme Court granted the petition for postconviction relief and remanded for trial. St. v. Henderson, 2004 MT 173, 322 M 69, 93 P3d 1231 (2004).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Required to Be Filed in Sentencing Court — General Provisions Regarding Substitution of Judge Inapplicable in Postconviction Proceedings: Harris moved to substitute the judge in a proceeding for postconviction relief, citing 3-1-804, which allows each adverse party one substitution of a District Judge in civil and criminal proceedings. The motion was denied, and Harris appealed. The Supreme Court held that the general provisions of Title 3, ch. 1, part 8, do not apply to the substitution of a District Judge in postconviction proceedings because the more specific provisions of this section require that petitions for postconviction relief be filed in the court that imposed the sentence. Harris v. St., 2003 MT 258, 317 M 406, 77 P3d 272 (2003).

Prison Behavior Modification Plans Violative of Excessive Sanction Protection and Equal Protection — State Directed to Revise Incarceration Procedures: Walker, an inmate with diagnosed mental illness, alleged that conditions at the state prison violated constitutional sanctions against excessive punishment and equal protection guarantees because of his mental condition. Although Walker had been released from the state prison when his petition for postconviction relief was considered by the Supreme Court, the case was not moot, as the state contended, because the prison programs remained in place. The court went on to consider whether behavior modification programs used at the prison unconstitutionally exacerbated inmates' mental health conditions and concluded that they do. The plain meaning of the dignity clause in Art. II, sec. 4, Mont. Const., commands that the intrinsic worth and basic humanity of persons may not be violated, and if the particular conditions of confinement cause serious mental illness to be greatly exacerbated or deprive inmates of their sanity, those conditions then cross into the realm of psychological torture. Thus, prison behavior modification programs and living conditions in maximum security constitute an affront to the inviolable right to human dignity and constitute cruel and unusual punishment when they exacerbate an inmate's mental health condition. The prison was directed to conform the operations of its administrative segregation units to the requirements of this opinion. Walker v. St., 2003 MT 134, 316 M 103, 68 P3d 872 (2003). See also Campbell v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 146, 306 M 45, 29 P3d 1034 (2001), and Wilson v. St., 2010 MT 278, 358 Mont. 438, 249 P.3d 28.

One-Year Limitation on All Postconviction Proceedings, Including Second or Subsequent Petitions — Exception: Defendant contended that the 1-year period of limitation in 46-21-102 applies only to an initial or original petition for postconviction relief, not to a second or subsequent petition. The Supreme Court disagreed. The 1-year period of limitation applies to the initiation of all postconviction proceedings, including those initiated by a second or subsequent petition. Further, under 46-21-105, in order to avoid dismissal, a second or subsequent petition must also demonstrate good cause why its claims were not asserted in the original petition. A narrow exception to the 1-year limitation period is allowed under 46-21-102(2), which provides that a petition that alleges newly discovered evidence may be filed 1 year after the evidence was discovered or reasonably should have been discovered. St. v. Root, 2003 MT 28, 314 M 186, 64 P3d 1035 (2003).

Failure of Counsel to Properly Withdraw or Preserve Direct Appeal — Denial of Postconviction Petition Erroneous: Adams filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel because his original court-appointed attorney failed to move to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial and because his subsequently appointed trial counsel offered a lesser included instruction on aggravated assault to the jury and failed to appeal to the Supreme Court following Adams' conviction, despite Adams' request to do so. The petition was denied on grounds that Adams failed to file an appeal within 60 days of judgment as required by former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and Adams appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Under 46-8-103, appointed counsel is required to continue representation until final judgment, including appellate review, unless counsel is relieved by court order. Adams' counsel failed to comply with the requirements of 46-8-103 and effect a valid withdrawal, so the right to appeal was not preserved. When a defendant would have appealed but for counsel's deficient performance, the error is prejudicial. Thus, denial of Adams' petition for postconviction relief on procedural grounds was reversible error, and on remand, Adams was allowed to raise the issues that would have been raised on direct appeal but for counsel's abandonment of the appeal, as well as the issues raised in the petition for postconviction relief that were not previously raised. St. v. Adams, 2002 MT 202, 311 M 202, 54 P3d 50 (2002), following In re Petition of Hans, 1998 MT 7, 288 M 168, 958 P2d 1175 (1998), and St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Contrary Instructions Regarding Appeal Process From Justice's Court — Appeal to District Court Considered Petition for Postconviction Relief: Boucher pleaded guilty to DUI in Justice's Court, signing a form stating that the plea was voluntary and constituted waiver of the right to appeal to District Court. Despite the waiver, the written judgment stated that Boucher could appeal to the District Court within 10 days. Boucher subsequently learned that his driving privileges would be revoked in Washington as a result of the guilty plea, so he moved to withdraw the guilty plea following conviction. The motion was denied, and Boucher appealed to District Court, but that court held that the guilty plea was voluntary and dismissed the appeal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction because under 46-17-203, entry of a guilty plea in Justice's Court waives a defendant's right to a trial de novo in District Court. Further, 46-17-311 procedurally requires adjudication of a matter by trial in a Justice's Court or City Court as a prerequisite to an appeal in District Court. Boucher then appealed to the Supreme Court, which exercised subject matter jurisdiction by considering Boucher's appeal to District Court as a petition for postconviction relief. Under this section, a defendant who asserts the illegality of a sentence and has exhausted all appeal remedies provided by law may petition for postconviction relief with the District Court in the county where the court of limited jurisdiction is located. A petition for postconviction relief is not another form of appeal from a criminal case, but a separate civil proceeding aimed at vacating, setting aside, or correcting a sentence, and is available to a defendant whose sentence is imposed by a court of limited jurisdiction. Here, the District Court correctly determined that Boucher had no right to appeal the Justice's Court's denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea. However, given the contrary instructions concerning the appeals process issued by the Justice of the Peace, the fact that the Justice's Court is not a court of record, and the nature of Boucher's constitutional challenge to the validity of his plea, the District Court held an evidentiary hearing to establish a factual basis for ruling on the issues, and those proceedings constituted the functional equivalent of a postconviction hearing. Boucher was eligible to pursue postconviction relief given the absence of an appellate remedy and the constitutional claims asserted, and the District Court erred in finding that it had a lack of subject matter jurisdiction. St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002), following St. v. Christensen, 265 M 374, 877 P2d 468 (1994), and St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002).

Issue of Counsel's Effective Use of Peremptory Juror Challenges More Appropriate When Raised as Petition for Postconviction Relief Rather Than on Direct Appeal When Record Silent: Russell was convicted of attempted deliberate homicide and appealed claiming ineffective assistance of counsel during jury selection. Russell contended that counsel failed to challenge for cause a relative of the victim and used two peremptory challenges to strike jurors who were outside the jury pool. Under the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel, challenged actions of counsel are presumed to be matters of trial strategy and a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel rendered adequate assistance and made all significant decisions in the exercise of reasonable professional judgment. Pursuant to St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M

47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), when the record does not illuminate the basis for the challenged acts or omissions of counsel, a claim of ineffective assistance is more appropriately raised in a petition for postconviction relief so that a supplemental record may be made. Here, the record was silent as to why Russell's counsel acted or failed to act regarding the juror challenges. Thus, the Supreme Court declined to discuss the issue on direct appeal. St. v. Russell, 2001 MT 278, 307 M 322, 37 P3d 678 (2001).

Requirement for Unanimous Verdict on at Least One Criminal Act Before Finding Guilt for Multiple Act Count — Continuous Course of Conduct Exception: In St. v. Weaver, 1998 MT 167, 290 M 58, 964 P2d 713 (1998), the Supreme Court held that a specific unanimity instruction to the jury was required when different criminal acts were charged in one count. When a genuine possibility exists that different jurors will conclude that a defendant committed disparate illegal acts subsumed under the single count, the special instruction serves to direct the jurors to reach a unanimous verdict on at least one specific criminal act before finding guilt for the multiple act count. Harris contended that the failure to give the unanimity jury instruction violated his due process rights and warranted retroactive application of Weaver and reversal of his conviction of incest. However, Weaver also established a continuous course of conduct exception to this rule when the criminal acts are so closely connected that they form part of one and the same transaction and thus one offense. In Harris's case, the criminal conduct occurred over a multiple-year period; however, the persistent illegal acts were so frequently perpetuated and so closely connected as to be viewed as a single, continuous, running offense. There was no possibility of jury confusion regarding Harris's incessant criminal acts. The conduct fell within the Weaver exception, so no unanimity instruction was necessary. The absence of District Court error on the issue mirrored the Supreme Court's refusal to invoke the plain error doctrine on appeal, so Harris was held to have received due process. St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001). Weaver was followed in St. v. Dasen, 2007 MT 87, 337 M 74, 155 P3d 1282 (2007).

Effect of 1997 Amendment on Supreme Court Authority to Resolve Postconviction Claims: Prior to 1997, it was allowable for a petition for postconviction relief to be filed either with the District Court that imposed the sentence or directly with the Supreme Court. The 1997 amendments to this section eliminated a postconviction petitioner's right to file a petition for postconviction relief directly with the Supreme Court, thereby removing Supreme Court authority to resolve issues cognizable only as postconviction claims under the court's original jurisdiction. Henceforth, if inmate petitions are for habeas corpus relief or other relief and are properly before the Supreme Court as an original proceeding, those petitions will be addressed and resolved accordingly. However, to the extent that the Supreme Court receives petitions that include claims cognizable or potentially cognizable only pursuant to postconviction proceedings, those petitions will be forwarded, pursuant to this section, for filing in the District Court that imposed the sentence, with a filing date identical to the date on which the petition was filed with the Supreme Court. Schrapps v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 214, 306 M 402, 36 P3d 338 (2001).

Question Whether Parole Denied for Failure to Satisfy Additional Treatment Conditions — Remand: Ringewold pleaded guilty to two counts of felony assault and was sentenced to a total of 14 years' commitment to the Department of Corrections. The next day, Ringewold was placed in the state hospital. The placement order allowed Ringewold to petition for a conditional release from the hospital, but did not specify any conditions. About 17 months later, Ringewold petitioned for release from the hospital. The state agreed that a hearing on the petition was proper, but argued that if it was found that Ringewold no longer suffered from a mental disease or defect that presented a risk to Ringewold or others, it was appropriate to remand Ringewold to the Department. The District Court ordered an independent mental evaluation, but it was never performed. Ringewold then filed another petition for release, but about the same time, the hospital staff determined that Ringewold would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment and transferred him to the state prison pursuant to 46-14-312. At the request of counsel, Ringewold was transferred back to the state hospital, with the state conceding that hospital placement was proper and that Ringewold should be allowed to petition for release pursuant to 46-14-312. About 4 months later, the Department Director sought an order transferring Ringewold back to the prison on grounds that Ringewold continued to suffer from a dangerous mental disorder but would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment for the disorder. At a conditional release hearing about 9 months later, the District Court orally resentenced Ringewold to 8 years in prison. The court specified that the total sentence not exceed more than the original sentence, but the court also conditioned Ringewold's parole on completion of an anger management course, moral reconnection therapy, and chemical dependence treatment. In a written amended judgment about 1 month later, the District Court reimposed the original 14-year sentence and restated the parole conditions. Ringewold appealed. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence was legally effective and constituted final judgment. However, it was not possible to determine from the record whether the additional conditions added to the sentence improperly lengthened Ringewold's sentence, so the case was remanded for supplementation of the factual record to determine if Ringewold was being denied consideration for parole because of failure to satisfy the additional treatment conditions and, if so, to strike the conditions from the amended judgment, because under those circumstances, the practical effect of the conditions would be to lengthen the sentence in violation of 46-14-312. St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001).

Record-Based or Nonrecord-Based Information Determinative of Appropriateness of Direct Appeal or Petition for Postconviction Relief — Direct Appeal Dismissed When Record Insufficient to Substantiate Effectiveness of Counsel: In 1999, White moved for an evidentiary hearing to allow the development of facts that were not part of the record but that were necessary to sustain a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court declared by order that a petition for postconviction relief would be the proper avenue for White's nonrecord-based ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Nevertheless, in late 2000, White appealed, contending that the claim of prejudicial error resulting from her trial counsel's various failures to provide representation, such as the failure to call witnesses, make an opening statement, or offer a theory of the case at any stage of the proceedings, was supported by the record and proper for direct appeal. The general rule set out in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), is that when ineffective assistance claims are based on facts of record, they must be raised on direct appeal, while claims based on allegations not documented in the record must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. The underlying principle of the rule is that a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance. The two distinct classifications of on-record and off-record actions tend to overlap at times, and though not easily distilled into a formula, the definitive question that decides whether actions are on-record or off-record is whether the record fully explains why counsel took the particular course of action. Generally, an alleged failure to object to the introduction of evidence, to the testimony of a witness, or to prosecutorial misconduct at trial is considered record-based and appropriate for direct appeal. Likewise, counsel's own conduct in presenting the case, such as improperly eliciting damaging testimony from a witness or rendering an improper opening statement or closing argument, may be pointed to as record-based. Decisions regarding the timing and number of objections and whether to offer no opening statement at all lie within counsel's tactical discretion, indicating that nonrecord-based information explaining the tactic may be involved. Similarly, counsel's failure to adequately investigate, to prepare a defense, to become familiar with critical areas of the applicable law, to offer a particular jury instruction, to object to the trial court's failure to consider sentencing alternatives, to object to the admission of evidence that is evidenced by the record, or to fully inform defendant of the consequences of various options and rights, even though the prejudicial results of the ineffectiveness appear on the record, may constitute a nonrecord-based claim. In White's case, the record supplied some indicia of why a certain objection was raised at a particular time, but was still insufficient to determine to what extent counsel's actions were purely tactical or resulted from deficient representation. Thus, the information was considered nonrecord-based and should have been raised by petition for postconviction relief, so White's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice. St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Earl, 2003 MT 158, 316 M 263, 71 P3d 1201 (2003), St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), St. v. St. Germain, 2007 MT 28, 336 M 17, 153 P3d 591 (2007), in which the Supreme Court declined to address a direct appeal of defense counsel's nonrecord-based reasons for making a double jeopardy argument and for failing to call a witness to testify in an incest case because the issues were appropriate for postconviction proceedings. See also St. v. Green, 2009 MT 114, 350 M 141, 205 P3d 798 (2009), in which an ineffective counsel appeal based on counsel's failure to request an accomplice instruction in a homicide trial was dismissed in favor of postconviction relief proceedings because plausible justifications existed for counsel's conduct that could not be addressed on appeal since the record did not resolve the factual questions surrounding counsel's actions.

Claim of Ineffective Assistance Not in Record — Claim Must Be Brought by Petition for Postconviction Relief: When the record does not provide for the basis for the challenged acts or omissions of counsel, a defendant claiming ineffective assistance must raise that claim by petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Weaver, 2001 MT 115, 305 M 315, 28 P3d 451 (2001), following St. v. Black, 270 M 329, 891 P2d 1162 (1995), St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611 (1995), and St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001). See also St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004), and St. v. Heavygun, 2011 MT 111, 360 Mont. 413, 253 P.3d 897.

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Pretrial Phase: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the pretrial phase, applying the two-pronged test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in failing to: (1) object to the procedure and use of Dawson's psychiatric evaluation; (2) advise him of his rights during the evaluation process; and (3) conduct an adequate pretrial investigation. On the first point, the procedure followed and the use of the psychiatric evaluation were consistent with the statutory procedure in effect at the time, and counsel had no reason to question it. On the second point, Dawson satisfied the deficiency prong of the Strickland test because he should have been informed of the potential consequences of participating in the evaluation; however, there was no evidence that Dawson was prejudiced at trial or sentencing. Dawson's version of the crimes was consistent with his defense theory, and at no time did he admit killing the victims, so counsel's failure to advise him of his Miranda rights was not prejudicial. On the third point, Dawson could not establish prejudice as a result of counsel's failure to obtain complete records and staff notes of the evaluation, to investigate Dawson's possible epilepsy, or to investigate or pursue Dawson's drug use—at trial or at sentencing as a mitigating factor. The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at the pretrial phase. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000). See also St. v. Armfield, 214 M 229, 693 P2d 1226 (1984), St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110 (1985), and Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674 (1997).

Out-of-Time Appeal Based on Claim of Ineffective Counsel Denied: An out-of-time appeal is a remedy that may be available to a defendant involved in a criminal proceeding who, through no fault of the defendant, misses a deadline for filing an appeal. Here, Garner moved for an out-of-time appeal on grounds of ineffective counsel. The trial court denied the motion after finding substantial factual evidence that Garner was fully advised of his right to appeal the postconviction relief order, as well as of the 60-day deadline for filing notice of appeal. The ineffective assistance argument was without merit, and the trial court was affirmed. St. v. Garner, 1999 MT 295, 297 M 89, 990 P2d 175, 56 St. Rep. 1180 (1999).

Presumption of Ineffective Counsel — Irreconcilable Conflict — Error in Failure to Investigate Timely Request for Substitution of Counsel: Generally, a defendant must establish both parts of the two-part test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984), to prevail in showing ineffectiveness of counsel: (1) that counsel made errors so serious that counsel was not functioning as the counsel guaranteed by the constitution; and (2) that counsel's deficient performance prejudiced the defense and deprived defendant of a fair trial. However, in some cases, counsel's performance is so deficient that a presumption of ineffectiveness arises and the second part of the test becomes unnecessary. Only when surrounding circumstances justify a presumption of ineffectiveness can a constitutional claim of ineffective counsel be sufficient without inquiry into counsel's actual performance at trial. Here, a presumption of ineffectiveness could have arisen by an actual conflict of interest or by an irreconcilable conflict, but in either case, once the presumption was established, the second part of the test did not need to be satisfied. To establish an irreconcilable conflict, defendant must show a complete collapse of the attorney-client relationship. New counsel should be appointed if defendant shows by material facts that there is a total lack of communication or ineffective assistance of counsel, but bare unsupported allegations are insufficient to justify appointment of new counsel. In the present case, Wilson filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court found that it had erred by denying a hearing when Wilson requested substitution of counsel but denied the petition on grounds that Wilson had received a fair trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied St. v. Vessey, 967 P2d 960 (Utah Ct. App. 1998), holding that when reviewing an error in failing to investigate a defendant's timely request for substitution, the question is not whether the defendant received effective assistance of counsel at a subsequent trial, but whether the conflict with counsel was sufficient that it required substitution of counsel at the time that the request was made. In Wilson's case, it could not be determined whether the District Court gave adequate consideration to the merits of Wilson's substitution request based on the facts at the time that the request was made or whether denial of the petition for postconviction relief was based simply on the court's observation of counsel at the time of trial. The order denying the petition was vacated and the case remanded for further proceedings. Wilson v. St., 1999 MT 271, 296 M 465, 989 P2d 813, 56 St. Rep. 1096 (1999), overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001). See also St. v. Zackuse, 250 M 385, 833 P2d 142 (1991), St. v. Jones, 278 M 121, 923 P2d 560, 53 St. Rep. 864 (1996), and St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371, 55 St. Rep. 284 (1998), which was overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001). See also St. v. Molder, 2007 MT 41, 336 M 91, 152 P3d 722 (2007), in which it was held that because no request for new counsel was made, a separate hearing to consider a continuance motion was unnecessary. Molder was followed in St. v. Raczy, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007).

Extra Conditions in Sentencing Order Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Stricken: The District Court that sentenced Waters imposed two extra conditions in the sentencing order that were not contained in the plea agreement or presentence investigation or contained in the oral sentence: (1) payment of supervision fees; and (2) submission to Texas authorities. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls. Thus, Waters contended that only the conditions contained in the oral sentence could be imposed. The Supreme Court clarified Lane, noting that Waters was on notice of the conditions in the plea agreement and presentence investigation and that those terms applied despite the ambiguous sentencing conditions that were imposed orally. However, the court remanded for an amendment of the written sentence to strike the submission to Texas authorities, which was never mentioned, and to strike the payment of supervision fees as well, unless it was determined that payment of the fees would not impose a significant hardship on Waters, pursuant to 46-23-1031. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Retroactive Applicability of Judicial Rule Regarding Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: Retroactivity is a threshold matter that compels the evenhanded application of a new rule for the conduct of criminal prosecutions to all similarly situated cases that are pending on direct appeal or not yet final. Therefore, all defendants whose cases meet those criteria are entitled to the retroactive application of a new judicial rule of criminal procedure. This standard applies irrespective of whether the new judicial rule constitutes a clear break from existing precedent and without regard to whether the rule was available to the District Court at the time that it ruled. Thus in the present case, the rule in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), that oral pronouncement of sentence controls over the written sentence for purposes of finality applied retroactively to Waters' appeal, even though the District Court did not have the Lane rule at the time of sentencing. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), following St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), overruling St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), Peterson v. Mont. Bank of Bozeman, N.A., 212 M 37, 687 P2d 673 (1984), and their progeny, and followed in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). See also Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989).

Exceptions to General Rule of Retroactivity — Guillaume Inapplicable to Case Finalized Before Adoption of New Constitutional Rule: Although Nichols' conviction, resulting in an enhanced penalty for use of a weapon, was finalized more than 5 years prior to the Supreme Court's decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), which created a new constitutional rule barring enhanced weapon sentences when the underlying offense requires proof of use of a weapon, Nichols nevertheless argued that the portion of his sentence precluded by Guillaume should be stricken from his sentence. The Supreme Court applied the retroactivity criteria in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), noting that two exceptions apply to the general rule of retroactivity. The first exception applies when the constitutional rule puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe; the second exception applies when the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute watershed rules of criminal procedure. Finding that Guillaume was not dictated by prior precedent and did not set out a watershed rule, the court held that the new rule did not require retroactive application to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when the Guillaume opinion was issued. Not only was Nichols' claim time-barred under the pre-1997 version of 46-21-102, his argument that the sentence should be reduced to prevent a miscarriage of justice also failed because miscarriage of justice refers to actual, not legal, innocence. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), followed in St. v. Baker, 1999 MT 251, 296 M 253, 989 P2d 335, 56 St. Rep. 987 (1999), and overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Guilty Plea Constituting Waiver of Nonjurisdictional Defects and Defenses: Gordon was charged in Montana with the murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery of an Idaho man. Gordon sought a ruling on a motion to require enforcement of the second of two plea agreements entered into with Idaho authorities regarding a sentence that might be imposed if Gordon's implicitness was proved in the homicide or if he was not truthful in the ongoing investigation. The state argued that Idaho could not bind Montana to a pretrial agreement in which Montana had not participated and contended that Idaho had previously voided the second plea agreement because of Gordon's untruthfulness. The District Court denied the motion. Gordon subsequently entered a plea agreement with Montana. The court obtained Gordon's understanding of the rights that he would give up by pleading guilty, including the right to an appeal. The court accepted Gordon's guilty plea to aggravated kidnapping and dismissed the other charges, ultimately imposing an 80-year sentence as recommended in the state plea agreement. On appeal, Gordon asserted that his constitutional rights were violated when the District Court did not sentence him pursuant to the second Idaho plea agreement. Citing St. v. Wheeler, 285 M 400, 948 P2d 698, 54 St. Rep. 1213 (1997), the Supreme Court held that after a criminal defendant pleads guilty of the offense charged, only the voluntary and intelligent character of the guilty plea may be attacked and that independent claims relating to prior deprivations of constitutional rights may not be raised. A voluntary and intelligent guilty plea constitutes a waiver of nonjurisdictional defects and defenses. St. v. Gordon, 1999 MT 169, 295 M 183, 983 P2d 377, 56 St. Rep. 654 (1999).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed With Supreme Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Amend Pleadings on Remand: Boucher filed with the Supreme Court for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court remanded to District Court for an evidentiary hearing on whether Boucher was denied effective assistance of counsel because of counsel's failure to investigate and formulate a defense based on the victim's history of making false accusations of sexual assault. On remand, Boucher sought to offer additional evidence of ineffective counsel unrelated to the issue remanded. Although a District Court has the discretion to grant or deny a motion to amend a postconviction petition when the petition is filed with that court, in cases like this when the petition is originally filed with the Supreme Court and remanded, the District Court does not have authority to grant leave to amend the pleadings to include allegations not included in the original petition. St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), distinguishing Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997), and Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

Counsel's Abandonment of Appeal — Postconviction Claims: All claims foreclosed from appeal because of counsel's abandonment of appeal may be raised in a postconviction petition. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997). In a subsequent proceeding, the state and Hans disagreed as to which claims were properly before the Supreme Court as part of the second amended petition for postconviction relief. Clarifying the 1997 Hans I decision, the court held that under this case scenario, Hans was entitled to raise two types of issues: (1) those issues that could have been raised in a direct appeal but for counsel's abandonment of the appeal; and (2) those issues properly raised in a petition for postconviction relief under this section that had not already been raised. In the future, a defendant whose counsel has abandoned an appeal should raise, in one petition for postconviction relief, the claim that counsel was ineffective in abandoning the appeal, all claims that could have been raised on direct appeal, and all claims that would normally be appropriate in a petition for postconviction relief, including challenges to the validity of the sentence and other ineffective assistance claims. In this case, Hans's objections to sentencing procedures were not properly preserved but were properly brought under the postconviction relief proceeding pursuant to this section. Those objections, as well as the ineffective assistance claims not raised in the first petition for postconviction relief, were not subject to dismissal as requested by the state. In re Petition of Hans, 1998 MT 7, 288 M 168, 958 P2d 1175, 55 St. Rep. 21 (1998). See also In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156 (1991), St. v. Nelson, 274 M 11, 906 P2d 663 (1995), and Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Ineffective Assistance Claims Denied — No Right to Miranda Warning When Defendant Requests Psychiatric Exam — Duty to Inform Defendant of Consequences of Participation in Evaluation: The defendant alleged that counsel failed to provide effective counsel based on lack of communication, adequacy of advice regarding mitigated deliberate homicide, adequacy of advice regarding mental illness, requesting and agreeing to the dissemination of mental health evaluations, ineffectiveness of the investigation and preparation for trial, and abandonment of the appeal. The Supreme Court denied the petition for postconviction relief except to allow the defendant to amend the petition to address appealable sentencing issues. The defense counsel's acquiescence to dissemination of the mental health report pursuant to 46-14-202 is not grounds for a finding of ineffective assistance of counsel. Subsequently decided case law cannot be used to judge an attorney's conduct at the time of representation. A defendant has no constitutional right to be informed of Miranda rights when, through the defendant's attorney, the defendant requests a psychiatric exam. Counsel has a duty to inform a defendant of the consequences of participation in a psychiatric evaluation. In this case, the defendant was not prejudiced by the defense counsel's alleged failure to inform the defendant of the right to remain silent during the mental health evaluation. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Postconviction Relief Denied — Counsel Not Ineffective — Guilty Plea Properly Entered — Mental Health Evaluators' Failure to Advise Defendant of Rights Not Violation of Due Process — Petition Allowed on Appealable Sentencing Issues: The defendant, who was 14 years old at the time of a school shooting incident, pleaded guilty to four counts and was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 100 years. The defendant petitioned for postconviction relief based on the claims of ineffective assistance of counsel; that the guilty plea was not entered knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently; and that the defendant was denied due process because the mental health evaluators did not advise the defendant of the right to counsel, of the right not to submit to evaluation, and that statements could be used against him. The Supreme Court denied the petition for postconviction relief except to allow the defendant to amend the petition to address appealable sentencing issues. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997). Reconsideration of the second petition for postconviction relief was denied in Hans v. St., 1998 MT 255, 291 M 227, 967 P2d 396, 55 St. Rep. 1052 (1998).

"Motion to Vacate Conviction" Construed as Motion for Postconviction Relief and Not Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Attorney Conflict of Interests — Petition Previously Denied: Howard filed a motion for postconviction relief in 1993, asserting that his attorney in his 1981 trial for felony theft had a conflict of interests because the attorney also represented a codefendant. The Supreme Court denied his petition as time-barred under 46-21-102. Howard then filed with the District Court a "Motion to Vacate Conviction", which the District Court construed as another petition for postconviction relief and also denied as time-barred. The Supreme Court held that it was proper for the District Court to construe the "Motion to Vacate Conviction" as another motion for postconviction relief. Despite Howard's argument that his motion did not meet the formal prerequisites for a motion for postconviction relief and that motions to withdraw a guilty plea are allowed after judgment by virtue of 46-16-105, the Supreme Court held: (1) that it had not always strictly enforced the requirements for a motion for postconviction relief, especially for persons appearing pro se; (2) that the content of Howard's motion was of the type usually made in motions for postconviction relief; and (3) that although other means of review of a sentence other than postconviction relief may sometimes be necessary because of exigent circumstances, the circumstances of Howard's situation, in which he waited over 10 years to challenge his conviction the first time, did not demonstrate those exigent circumstances. The Supreme Court held that this petition, like Howard's first petition for postconviction relief, was time-barred by this section. St. v. Howard, 282 M 522, 938 P2d 710, 54 St. Rep. 464 (1997).

Review of Decision of Sentence Review Division: A petition for postconviction relief or other extraordinary writ is appropriate for the purpose of challenging a decision of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Torres, 277 M 514, 922 P2d 1180, 53 St. Rep. 826 (1996).

Substantial Change in Applicable Law — Teague Criteria: Byers filed for postconviction relief based on allegations that the Montana Supreme Court had reversed its position on the constitutionality of two sets of jury instructions regarding the mental element of the offense of deliberate homicide and voluntary intoxication subsequent to Byers' previous appeal. The U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), analyzing the retroactive application of judicial decisions to cases on collateral review, stated that a new rule will not be applied to cases coming before the court on collateral review after the date of the decision. A new rule was defined as a rule in which the result was not dictated by precedent at the time that the defendant's conviction became final. The Montana Supreme Court found that Byers' objection to jury instructions in his previous appeal had been overruled in St. v. Rothacher, 272 M 303, 901 P2d 82 (1995), amounting to a substantial change in applicable law that was not barred by Teague, but that the instructional error in Byers' trial was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The court declined to apply the new rule regarding instructions on voluntary intoxication set out in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), because that decision specifically precluded retroactive application and because it had been subsequently overruled by the U.S. Supreme Court, resulting in no substantial change in the applicable law. Byers v. Mahoney, 279 M 28, 929 P2d 202, 53 St. Rep. 624 (1996). The Teague criteria were applied in St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999). The Teague criteria were also applied in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999).

Failure to Appoint New Counsel During Posttrial Hearing on Counsel's Effectiveness: Finley contended that the District Court denied him his right to counsel's undivided loyalty under 46-21-201 by failing to appoint new counsel to represent him at a posttrial hearing regarding his counsel's effectiveness, at which his counsel confronted him concerning the sufficiency of his allegations of ineffectiveness and then took the stand to rebut those allegations. Section 46-21-201 was not in effect at the time of the hearing and thus did not apply; however, under this section, a postconviction hearing is a separate proceeding that is available after sentencing and applies when there is no adequate remedy of appeal. Further, under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., the right to counsel is composed of two correlative rights—the right to counsel of reasonable competence and the right to counsel's undivided loyalty. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Zackuse, 250 M 385, 833 P2d 142 (1991), in holding that when a defendant and counsel have a conflict so great that it results in a total lack of communication or that if counsel fails to render effective assistance, new counsel should be appointed. The potential for substantial prejudice to Finley existed at the posttrial hearing, qualifying the hearing as a critical stage in the proceedings. It was error for the trial court to fail to appoint new counsel, at least for purposes of the competency hearing. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996).

Jury Misconduct Alleged in Newspaper and Not in Evidence in Record: Alleged jury misconduct was disclosed by a newspaper article the day after the trial. The related issue that counsel was ineffective for failure to challenge the misconduct could not be considered on direct appeal because the evidence of misconduct was not part of the District Court trial record. The issue had to be raised in a petition for postconviction relief, and the District Court erred in denying the petition on the grounds that the issue could have been and was not raised on direct appeal. St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611, 52 St. Rep. 947 (1995).

Lower Court's Ruling on Untimely Motion Upheld: The state argued that the trial court should have summarily dismissed Barrack's motion for a new trial because it was filed late and that the trial court should not have treated the motion as a petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court noted that at the time that the trial court incorrectly treated the untimely motion for a new trial as a petition for postconviction relief, Barrack could still have filed a timely appeal and may have been lulled into a position in which he did not timely pursue his appeal rights. The Supreme Court held that under the unique facts of the case, it would affirm the lower court's decision to rule on the untimely motion but that its decision could not be read as enlarging the scope of postconviction relief or as diminishing a defendant's obligation to timely file any motions. St. v. Barrack, 267 M 154, 882 P2d 1028, 51 St. Rep. 983 (1994).

Postconviction Relief From City Court Allowed — Plain Meaning Rule Followed: Christensen was convicted in Plentywood City Court of several traffic violations and, following conviction, filed a petition for postconviction relief in District Court. The District Court dismissed the petition based upon its conclusion that postconviction relief could be had only from judgments of a court of record. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that subsection (2) of this section clearly provides for postconviction relief from judgments of a City Court and that the statute is clear and unambiguous and should be followed. St. v. Christensen, 265 M 374, 877 P2d 468, 51 St. Rep. 542 (1994).

Claim That Another Offense More Applicable Than Offense to Which Defendant Pleaded Guilty — Nonjurisdictional Claims — Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: Hagan pleaded guilty to and was convicted of a charge of attempted sexual intercourse without consent. In a petition for postconviction relief, Hagan alleged that the conviction was improper and violated his constitutional rights because the victim was his natural daughter and thus the only crime with which he could have been charged, convicted, and sentenced was incest. The District Court dismissed the request based on its conclusion that Hagan's claims were jurisdictional, citing Sword v. St., 746 P2d 423 (Wyo. 1987). The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that U.S. v. Cortez, 973 F2d 764 (9th Cir. 1992), described jurisdictional claims in the context of waiver as "those cases in which the district court could determine that the government lacked the power to bring the indictment at the time of accepting the guilty plea from the face of the indictment or from the record". In this case, Hagan's claims were nonjurisdictional because at the time of accepting the guilty plea, the state did have the power to bring charges against Hagan based on his alleged conduct and nothing to the contrary was evident from the face of the information. Because the validity of Hagan's plea was not in question, he was precluded from seeking postconviction relief on the bases raised in the petition. The nonjurisdictional claims were waived when Hagan entered a guilty plea. Hagan v. St., 265 M 31, 873 P2d 1385, 51 St. Rep. 230 (1994). The applicability of the jurisdictional defect claim was followed in St. v. Cech, 2007 MT 184, 338 M 330, 167 P3d 389 (2007), in which it was decided that a defendant did not waive a double jeopardy claim when pleading guilty because the trial court had before it the record of defendant's conviction in another state that was sufficient for the court to determine whether the government lacked the power to bring the charges at issue. See also Stilson v. St., 278 M 20, 924 P2d 238 (1996).

Failure to Challenge Sentence Validity — Petition for Modification Properly Denied: Defendant did not dispute that her sentence for robbery was within the statutory maximum or that the District Court abused its discretion in imposing sentence, but rather alleged a conflict of interest and ineffective assistance of counsel. This did not provide a basis for postconviction relief under this section, and the petition for modification of the sentence was properly denied. St. v. Bull Coming, 253 M 71, 831 P2d 578, 49 St. Rep. 376 (1992).

Attorney's Performance Not Deficient: In evaluating ineffective assistance of counsel claims, the Supreme Court uses the two-part test set forth in Strickland v. Washington, 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984). First, counsel's performance must be deficient. To assess deficient performance, the court employs the "reasonably effective assistance test" of whether a defendant's counsel acted within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases. Second, counsel's deficient performance must have so prejudiced defendant as to deprive him of a fair trial. The standard for evaluating prejudice is whether a reasonable probability exists that but for counsel's deficient performance, the trial's outcome would have been different. However, in evaluating a defense counsel's performance, the court will not second guess trial tactics and strategy. In this case, substantial evidence supports the trial court's conclusion that another lawyer would not have obtained a more favorable result for defendant considering the amount of evidence the state presented against him. St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182, 47 St. Rep. 328 (1990), followed in St. v. Biehle, 251 M 257, 824 P2d 268, 49 St. Rep. 47 (1992), and St. v. Weaver, 2001 MT 115, 305 M 315, 28 P3d 451 (2001). See also Eiler v. St., 254 M 39, 833 P2d 1124, 49 St. Rep. 611 (1992).

Judge's Remarks on Defense Counsel's Conduct of Trial — No Showing of Bias: Defendant argued that the trial court judge's observations regarding the manner in which defense counsel conducted the defense indicated an unwillingness or inability by the judge to impartially consider that defense counsel ineffectively represented defendant. However, the mere fact that the trial judge articulated his observations does not, without more, constitute bias. The remarks came at the end of the hearing for postconviction relief after all evidence had been presented. St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182, 47 St. Rep. 328 (1990), distinguishing St. v. Musgrove, 187 M 549, 610 P2d 710 (1980).

Prosecutor's Solicitation of Excluded Evidence: The defendant contended that he was denied a fair trial because the prosecutor elicited testimony from the arresting officer concerning statements made by the defendant at the time of his arrest that had been ruled inadmissible by the trial court. The Supreme Court ruled that the error in admitting the evidence was cured by the trial court's admonishing the jury to disregard the inadmissible statements. St. v. Kolberg, 241 M 105, 785 P2d 702, 47 St. Rep. 120 (1990).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel at Trial and on Appeal — Not Established: The defendant argued that his trial and appeal attorneys did not argue his case fully. The Supreme Court reviewed the record and held that the attorneys had presented the strongest arguments in the defendant's favor and had performed in a competent manner. In re Petition of Martin, 240 M 419, 787 P2d 746, 46 St. Rep. 2213 (1989).

Mere Allegations of Prejudice Insufficient to Satisfy Cumulative Error Doctrine: Defendant contended that the overall demeanor of the prosecution and the District Court, together with other alleged errors, required a reversal of his conviction; however, he articulated no particular comments or remarks and alleged no prejudice to his substantial rights. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the cumulative error doctrine, which is the accumulation of errors which prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial, but noted that mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice are insufficient to satisfy the doctrine. The resolution of the alleged errors indicated no error meriting reversal of this case, and the court held that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing prejudice and declined to reverse his conviction on grounds of cumulative error. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), St. v. Hatfield, 2018 MT 229, 392 Mont. 509, 426 P.3d 569.

Right to Jury Trial — Not Applicable to Suspended Sentence Revocation Proceedings: Since a trial by jury under the seventh amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., is guaranteed only in "criminal prosecutions", it does not apply in proceedings for revocation of a suspended sentence. St. v. Watts, 221 M 104, 717 P2d 24, 43 St. Rep. 670 (1986).

Action for Postconviction Relief Exclusive Means of Establishing District Court Jurisdiction to Modify Sentence: Once a valid sentence has been pronounced by a District Court, that court lacks jurisdiction to modify the sentence upon postjudgment motion by the defendant. The District Court can only modify the sentence if the defendant files a motion for postconviction relief under Title 46, ch. 21. To reduce duplication of effort, the Supreme Court considered defendant's postjudgment motion to be a motion for postconviction relief. Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985), followed in St. v. George, 224 M 495, 730 P2d 412, 43 St. Rep. 2363 (1986), In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988), and in St. v. Fertterer, 260 M 397, 860 P2d 151, 50 St. Rep. 1135 (1993).

Prison's Custody Classification as Alleged Violation of Plea Bargaining Agreement — Withdrawal of Plea Denied: Under a plea bargain agreement, defendant was sentenced to 10 years as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) without parole. Upon entering prison, he was held in close custody for 24 months under prison rules calling for dangerous offenders and those sentenced without parole to serve 24 months in close custody prior to being considered for transfer to lower, more amenable custody levels. The prosecution, defense counsel, defendant, and judge were all unaware of those rules. Defendant was not entitled to withdraw his plea on the ground he was kept in close custody for 24 months in violation of his plea agreement. There was no violation of the agreement, nor was he entitled to the additional good time credits he would have received had he not been held so long in close custody. Prison officials take many factors into account in making custody reclassifications, and there was no guarantee he would have been held in close custody only for the time he claimed he should have been upon entry to the prison. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984).

Burden of Proving Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — No Prejudice Shown: Where the defendant alleged, in his petition for postconviction relief, that he had received ineffective assistance of counsel at trial because his attorney: (1) failed to invoke the spousal privilege on the defendant's behalf; (2) failed to interview a witness and call other witnesses; (3) was absent from a presentence investigation report interview; and (4) failed to object to alleged misconduct by the prosecutor, the Supreme Court found, under the rationale of St. v. LaValley, 203 M 393, 661 P2d 869, 40 St. Rep. 527 (1983), and Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983), that the defendant had an especially heavy burden of proving ineffective assistance of counsel when that issue was raised for the first time in a petition for postconviction relief and could have been previously raised on direct appeal. The court found that the defendant failed to show how he was prejudiced by the alleged acts constituting ineffective assistance. St. v. Henricks, 206 M 469, 672 P2d 20, 40 St. Rep. 1786 (1983), overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that the Supreme Court can review issues in postconviction proceedings that could have been raised on direct appeal, in Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995). See also St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182, 47 St. Rep. 328 (1990).

Abuse of Postconviction Relief to Raise Issues That Should Have Been Raised Earlier: After a second conviction on charges of homicide, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery, the Supreme Court affirmed the conviction of the defendant, who then filed a petition for postconviction relief on the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel, which was eventually denied by the District Court. On appeal of the denial of that petition, the Supreme Court held that the defendant's failure to raise the issue of ineffective counsel in earlier proceedings would not bar the court from considering that issue but stated that the fact that the issue was not raised at a pretrial hearing, during trial, or on appeal would be considered by the court as an element bearing on the merits of the defendant's claims. The language of 46-21-101 clearly intends that postconviction relief be available to convicted persons who have not had their conviction reviewed on appeal and that it is an abuse of the postconviction relief process to use it to raise an issue which should have been raised earlier in the proceedings. Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Whether Relief Moot When Sentence Already Served:

Because of the violation of the conditions of his probation, the defendant's deferred imposition of sentence for selling dangerous drugs was revoked and the defendant was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment by the District Court of the Fifth District. He was subsequently sentenced to 40 years' imprisonment by the District Court of the Fourth District for a robbery which was one of the grounds for revocation of the deferred sentence on the drug conviction. After the defendant had fully served his 10-year sentence, he appealed from the denial of a petition for postconviction relief in regard to the 10-year sentence. The Supreme Court affirmed the denial of the petition, holding that no challenge may be made to a sentence which has been fully served, under the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in Lane v. Williams, 455 US 624, 71 L Ed 2d 508, 102 S Ct 1322 (1982), that the record did not show that he received a greater sentence on the robbery charge due to the 10-year drug charge sentence, and that the defendant's appeal was therefore moot. St. v. Jelle, 201 M 111, 651 P2d 1257, 39 St. Rep. 1989 (1982).

A petition for postconviction relief is not moot when the sentence for the conviction has been served unless there is no possibility of any resulting negative collateral legal consequence arising from the conviction. St. v. Standley, 192 M 54, 626 P2d 248, 38 St. Rep. 522 (1981), citing, to the same effect, White Sulphur Springs v. Voise, 136 M 1, 343 P2d 855 (1959).

Two-Judge Disqualification Unavailable to Postconviction Petitioner: Although a postconviction petition filed under this chapter is civil in nature, the petitioner is not entitled to two substitutions of presiding judges as allowed in 3-1-801 (now replaced by 3-1-802). An applicant for postconviction relief is directed by the more specific provisions of this chapter to bring the petition in the Supreme Court or in the court that sentenced him. A specific statute controls over a general statute. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Venue in Sentencing Court for Postconviction Relief: Venue for a petition for postconviction relief properly lies in the court that imposes the sentence for the conviction under this section. Thus where a defendant petitions for postconviction relief in Silver Bow County from a rape conviction issued in Silver Bow County for the purpose of altering consideration of his criminal record in a sentencing for another, later conviction issued in Yellowstone County, it was error for the District Court in Silver Bow County to dismiss the petition for postconviction relief filed in Silver Bow County. St. v. Standley, 192 M 54, 626 P2d 248, 38 St. Rep. 522 (1981).

Petition for Postconviction Relief — No Time Limitation: Petitioner applied for postconviction relief 8½ years after he was sentenced. The County Attorney contended that he was barred by laches from attempting to withdraw his guilty plea. The postconviction hearing statutes are an attempt by the Legislature to consolidate all of the common-law statutory remedies normally available to challenge a sentence. The Legislature did not intend to impose an absolute time constraint on the filing of an application for postconviction relief [until 1981, when a limit of 5 years from the date of conviction was set], and therefore laches does not apply. The length of delay may be considered, however, in viewing the good faith and credibility of the moving party. Petitioner claimed ineffective assistance of counsel and wished to withdraw his guilty plea. Nothing in the record indicated ineffective counsel, and the long delay makes the situation even less favorable to the petitioner. The application for postconviction relief was denied. In re McNair, 189 M 321, 615 P2d 916 (1980).

Effective Counsel — Knowing and Intelligent Waiver of Time to Consult: The District Court did not err in refusing postconviction relief on the basis of ineffective counsel where defendant's past criminal record and the hearing transcript reflect that defendant was aware of "stand-in" counsel at a sentencing hearing yet knowingly and intelligently refused an opportunity to take the time necessary to talk with counsel. St. v. Haynie, 186 M 374, 607 P2d 1128 (1980).

Objection That Facts Do Not Constitute Offense — When Taken: Under former law, the objection that the facts stated in an information do not constitute a public offense could be taken by demurrer, at the trial under a plea of not guilty, or after the trial in arrest of judgment. St. v. Smith, 58 M 567, 194 P 131 (1920).

1997 Amendment: Chapter 378 in (1), at beginning of introductory clause, inserted exception clause, after “within” substituted “1 year” for “5 years”, and at end inserted “becomes final. A conviction becomes final for purposes of this chapter when”; inserted (1)(a) through (1)(c) outlining conditions of finality of a conviction; inserted (2) limiting an appeal based on newly discovered evidence to 1 year after final conviction or reasonable discovery of the evidence; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1997.

Severability: Section 8, Ch. 378, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 9(1), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: “Except as provided in subsection (2), [sections 3 through 6] [amending 46-21-101, 46-21-102, 46-21-105, and 46-21-201] apply to proceedings in which the conviction becomes final:

(a) after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]; or

(b) during the 12 months prior to the [effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997] if a petition under Title 46, chapter 21, is filed within the 12 months after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997].”

1991 Amendment: Inserted reference to 46-21-101; and made minor change in style.

1981 Amendment: Substituted “within 5 years of the date of the” for “after”.

Case Notes

Defendant May Not Assert That Evidence Is “Newly Discovered” Under 46-21-102(2) Exception When Defendant’s Own Representations to Court 4 Years Prior Relied on Same “Recantation” by Victim and Conviction of Different Defendant. Worthan v. St., 2023 MT 151, 413 Mont. 155, 533 P.3d 1033.

District Court Properly Denied Defendant’s Petition for Postconviction Relief — Doctor’s Report Considered Commentary on Alleged Victim’s Medical Record Rather Than Newly Discovered Evidence of Actual Innocence. Oliphant v. St., 2023 MT 43, 411 Mont. 250, 525 P.3d 1214.

Postconviction Relief — Newly Discovered Evidence Requirement Not Met — Ineffective Assistance of Appellate Counsel Alleged. Crabtree v. St., 2022 MT 133, 409 Mont. 211, 512 P.3d 1187.

Evidence Not Newly Discovered — Postconviction Petition Time-Barred: The defendant filed a petition for postconviction relief 3 years after the 1-year deadline for filing had expired. He contended that he had newly discovered evidence that warranted an exception to the deadline. After the District Court denied his petition, he appealed to the Supreme Court, which concluded that evidence that the District Court had told him he would not be required to register as a violent offender did not constitute newly discovered evidence. The Supreme Court agreed that his petition was therefore time-barred. Mascarena v. St., 2019 MT 78, 395 Mont. 245, 438 P.3d 323.

Failure to Adequately Address Newly Discovered Evidence Claim: The District Court failed to adequately address the defendant’s newly discovered evidence claim when it made no specific conclusions regarding the claim and did not identify the legal standard required for the defendant to succeed on the claim. Therefore, on appeal, the Supreme Court remanded the defendant’s newly discovered evidence claim to the District Court to apply the standard stated in 46-21-102 and independently consider and rule on the claim. Wilkes v. St., 2015 MT 243, 380 Mont. 388, 355 P.3d 755.

Petitioner for Postconviction Relief — Presumption of Guilt Following Conviction: Because a petitioner who has filed a petition for postconviction relief is presumed guilty following the entry of a judgment of conviction, the petitioner’s burden in seeking postconviction relief is greater than that imposed on a petitioner seeking a new trial under 46-16-702. Marble v. St., 2015 MT 242, 380 Mont. 366, 355 P.3d 742.

Petition for Postconviction Relief Based on Newly Discovered Evidence — Cases Relying on Fifth Factor in Clark Overruled: Years after being convicted of sexual assault, the petitioner filed a petition for postconviction relief after his alleged victim recanted. Later, however, the alleged victim said he was coerced into recanting. The District Court denied the petitioner's request for a new trial and based its decision on the concurring opinion in St. v. Beach, 2013 MT 130, 370 Mont. 163, 302 P.3d 47, which requires a petitioner to affirmatively and unquestionably establish his innocence. On appeal, the petitioner argued that the District Court should have instead applied the five factors in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 Mont. 8, 125 P.3d 1099. The Supreme Court disagreed, and overruled cases where it had applied the fifth factor in Clark to a petition for postconviction relief. However, the Supreme Court also reversed the District Court, holding that the District Court had erred in applying the test in the Beach concurrence. The Supreme Court ruled that the test in 46-21-102 applies to a petition for postconviction relief that is based upon newly discovered evidence, as well as the first four factors in Clark, and remanded the matter to the District Court for further proceedings. Marble v. St., 2015 MT 242, 380 Mont. 366, 355 P.3d 742.

No Abuse of Discretion in Limiting Scope of Petition for Postconviction Relief to Original Petition: A motion to file amended petition for postconviction relief was properly limited to new evidence supporting claims that were in the original petition and not new claims. Bullman v. State, 2014 MT 78, 374 Mont. 323, 321 P.3d 121.

Claim of Attorney Malpractice Not Claim for Postconviction Relief: Spencer brought an action for legal malpractice against Beck, his attorney in a criminal case. Spencer alleged that Beck's failure to represent him properly resulted in Spencer's conviction and in economic damages and emotional distress. Just prior to trial the District Court sua sponte dismissed Spencer's claim, holding that the claim was for postconviction relief and was barred because it was not brought within 1 year of the conviction. The Supreme Court held that Spencer's claim had sufficiently set out facts that on their face showed the elements of malpractice; therefore, the claim was not for postconviction relief and was subject to a 3-year statute of limitations. Spencer v. Beck, 2010 MT 256, 358 Mont. 295, 245 P.3d 21.

Appeal Raising Unconstitutional Self-Incrimination — Motion to Amend Judgment Subject to Normal Time Limits: Parrish was required to complete Phase II of the sex offender treatment program at Montana State Prison but argued that fulfilling the program requirement for disclosing his past criminal history was a violation of his constitutional right against self-incrimination. He petitioned the District Court for modification of his sentence, but the petition was denied as untimely. The Supreme Court held that the same time limitations for review of a judgment by a District Court applied to Parrish's petition to the District Court notwithstanding that Parrish had raised a constitutional issue concerning his sentence, those time limitations being the ones set forth in 46-18-116, 46-21-102, and Rule 4(5)(b)(i), M.R. App. P. Parrish filed his motion to amend judgment more than a year after the time for appeal to the Supreme Court had expired. St. v. Parrish, 2010 MT 196, 357 Mont. 375, 239 P.3d 957.

Second Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Procedurally or Time Barred: After a 1995 petition for postconviction relief was denied, Beach filed in 2008 for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence, but the District Court, without a hearing, denied the petition on grounds that it was procedurally and time barred. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The 2008 petition claimed that the newly discovered evidence was only recently available and thus could not have been raised in the 1995 petition. Since nothing indicated a lack of diligence on Beach's part in locating the new evidence, the Supreme Court granted Beach the benefit of the doubt as to whether he acted with sufficient alacrity in locating the new evidence, so the 2008 petition was not procedurally barred. To determine whether Beach would be entitled to a new trial based on newly discovered evidence, the court applied the criteria in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P.3d 1099 (2005), regarding a trial court's consideration of what impact new evidence might have when looking prospectively at a new trial with a new jury. The court concluded that the District Court abused its discretion by denying the petition without holding an evidentiary hearing on the new evidence. The case was remanded to allow a hearing to evaluate whether the evidence was actually newly discovered and whether a reasonable jury would have found Beach guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. The newly discovered evidence must be material to the issues at trial and neither cumulative nor merely impeaching, and in order to prevail on a substantive innocence claim, Beach was required to show by clear and convincing evidence that but for a procedural error, no reasonable juror would have found him guilty. Beach v. St., 2009 MT 398, 353 M 411, 220 P.3d 667 (2009). See also Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P.2d 622 (1999), and St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P.3d 1232 (2003).

On remand, the District Court concluded that Beach had presented sufficient evidence of his actual innocence to warrant a new trial, and the state appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. To overcome the presumption of guilt that arises from a conviction at trial, an actual innocence petitioner must show that new reliable evidence — whether it be exculpatory scientific evidence, trustworthy eyewitness accounts, or critical physical evidence — when viewed against the trial evidence demonstrates the petitioner is actually innocent of the crime for which the petitioner was convicted. An actual innocence claim may be either substantive or procedural. A substantive innocence petitioner must show by clear and convincing evidence that no reasonable juror would find the petitioner guilty, whereas a procedural innocence petitioner must merely show that it is likely or probable that no reasonable jury would find the petitioner guilty. While a substantive innocence petitioner who satisfies the burden of proof is forever exonerated, a procedural innocence petitioner who satisfies the burden of proof merely avoids the application of procedural bars and is allowed to present claims of constitutional trial error at a postconviction hearing. After reviewing both the new and old evidence, the Supreme Court concluded that the District Court erred in considering only the new evidence and that Beach did not provide reliable evidence to demonstrate either substantive or procedural actual innocence. St. v. Beach, 2013 MT 130, 370 Mont. 163, 302 P.3d 47.

District Court's Subject Matter Jurisdiction Not Circumscribed by Statutory Time Bar: This section constitutes a rigid, categorical time prescription that governs postconviction petitions, and the statutory 1-year time bar on filing postconviction petitions does not circumscribe a District Court's subject matter jurisdiction. However, a District Court is not precluded from raising the timeliness of a petition sua sponte, nor does the court's decision to raise the timeliness issue on its own initiative invoke due process considerations. The court must afford the parties fair notice and an opportunity to present their positions before acting sua sponte to dismiss a petition as untimely and must determine whether the interests of justice would be better served by addressing the merits or dismissing the petition as time barred. Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), overruling In re Petition of Gray, 274 M 1, 908 P2d 1352 (1995), St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and other cases to the extent that they have held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Petition for Postconviction Relief Required Before Request for Counsel Considered: Davis filed a motion requesting counsel to prepare postconviction proceedings. While the motion was pending, the time for filing a postconviction petition expired. The District Court denied the motion for counsel on grounds that the time for a postconviction petition had run. Although the court erred in its conclusion because 42 days remained for filing a petition when the motion for counsel was filed, the Supreme Court nevertheless affirmed because Davis was required to file a petition for postconviction relief before the motion for appointment of counsel could be considered. Absent a valid petition, the motion for counsel was properly denied. Davis v. St., 2007 MT 207, 339 M 1, 167 P3d 892 (2007).

Failure of Counsel to Perfect Direct Appeal — Remand: Following conviction in Municipal Court for partner or family member assault, Woepfel's trial counsel filed a notice of appeal to District Court. Woepfel obtained new counsel, but counsel failed to file a brief to perfect the appeal, and the appeal was dismissed. The new counsel ultimately withdrew because of a conflict of interest, and Woepfel's next new counsel filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds that Woepfel was denied effective assistance of counsel and was denied the right to confront witnesses in the underlying case because the conviction was based on hearsay testimony. The petition was denied, and Woepfel appealed. The Supreme Court noted that trial counsel's notice of appeal objectively indicated Woepfel's intent to appeal and that it was only because appellate counsel failed to file a brief that the appeal was dismissed, resulting in prejudice to Woepfel. Denial of the petition for postconviction relief was reversed, and the case was remanded for consideration of any claims that Woepfel could have made on direct appeal, including the claim that because the conviction was based on hearsay, Woepfel's right to confront witnesses was violated. Woepfel v. Billings, 2006 MT 283, 334 M 306, 146 P3d 789 (2006).

Facially Invalid Sentence — Statutory Bar Against Appeal Unconstitutional — Habeas Corpus Relief Granted: Lott was sentenced in 1992 for aggravated kidnapping, sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated burglary, and felony assault, and each sentence was enhanced by 10 years for use of a dangerous weapon. The 5-year limit on appealing the sentences that was in effect at sentencing (now a 1-year limit) expired, so Lott was procedurally barred from challenging the sentences. The Supreme Court subsequently decided in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), that application of the weapons enhancement to a felony offense that itself required proving use of a weapon constituted a double jeopardy violation. Guillaume was held to apply retroactively in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), so Lott's sentence was unconstitutionally enhanced with regard to the aggravated burglary and felony assault convictions. The state asserted that Lott was procedurally barred from raising the issue in a habeas corpus petition because Lott did not raise the issue on direct appeal or in a petition for postconviction relief. After analyzing habeas corpus and postconviction relief in Montana, the Supreme Court noted the constitutional guarantee that the writ of habeas corpus may never be suspended and concluded that as applied to a facially invalid sentence, the procedural bar in 46-22-101 unconstitutionally suspends the writ. Even if Lott had filed a direct appeal or petition for postconviction relief, the double jeopardy argument would have been unavailing because Guillaume and Whitehorn were not decided until well after both filing dates had expired. In order to avoid a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice, the Supreme Court granted Lott's petition for habeas corpus and remanded for resentencing pursuant to Guillaume and Whitehorn. Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006), followed in St. v. Jackson, 2007 MT 186, 338 M 344, 165 P3d 321 (2007), and St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

Facially Invalid Sentence — Statutory Procedural Bar Unconstitutionally Suspends Writ of Habeas Corpus: In 1992, the District Court enhanced Lott's sentence for aggravated burglary and felony assault because Lott used a dangerous weapon during the crimes. Under St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), and St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), the enhanced penalties were invalid because applying the weapons enhancement penalty to a felony offense that itself requires proving the use of a weapon violates double jeopardy. Lott challenged the sentence by a petition characterized as a writ of habeas corpus. The state argued that Lott could have raised the constitutional issues but did not and that Lott was statutorily barred from raising the issues in 2006. The Supreme Court found that Lott's sentence was enhanced unconstitutionally in light of Guillaume and Whitehorn, which apply retroactively. Because Art. II, sec. 19, Mont. Const., provides that the writ of habeas corpus may never be suspended, the procedural bar in 46-22-101(2) unconstitutionally suspends the writ, and implementing the statutory bar to allow incarceration of a person pursuant to a facially invalid sentence would be a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice. Therefore, habeas corpus relief was warranted, and Lott's petition was granted. However, Lott challenged only the sentence and not the underlying conviction, so on remand, Lott was not entitled to be released but only to be resentenced. Lott v. St., 2006 MT 240, 333 M 531 (2006).

Time for Challenge of Sentence Enhancement Expired — Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: In 2003, Bingman filed a petition for postconviction relief challenging a 1986 sentence enhancement. The District Court denied the petition as untimely, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the applicable 1995 version of this section, a petition for postconviction relief needed to be filed within 5 years of the final sentence (now 1 year), and because Bingman's petition was filed long after the statutory limit, the petition was properly denied. Bingman v. St., 2005 MT 272, 329 M 151, 122 P3d 1235 (2005).

Jurisdictional and Nonjurisdictional Claims Subject to Time Limitation: In a petition for postconviction relief, Daniels contended that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to preside over his case because, as a juvenile, Daniels never expressly waived his right to a hearing on whether the case should be moved from Youth Court to District Court. The Supreme Court did not reach the merits of the issue because Daniels' claim was time-barred. Both jurisdictional and nonjurisdictional claims are subject to the time limitation in this section. The time bar applies to all claims except claims alleging the existence of newly discovered evidence that would establish the petitioner's innocence. Daniels' jurisdictional claim was therefore properly dismissed as time-barred. St. v. Daniels, 2005 MT 110, 327 M 78, 111 P3d 675 (2005), following Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004).

Claim of Illegal Sentence Based on Lack of Jurisdiction to Be Raised on Direct Appeal, Not Postconviction Petition — Pena Applied: Camarillo was a minor when he was convicted in 1999 of deliberate homicide, robbery, and aggravated burglary and sentenced as an adult offender to 70 years in the state prison. The case was filed directly in District Court rather than Youth Court, as allowed under 41-5-206. Camarillo filed a petition for postconviction relief in 2003, claiming that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The state responded that the claims could have been raised on direct appeal, and the District Court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the District Court properly exercised jurisdiction under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., so Camarillo's jurisdiction argument failed. The court then applied

Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and held that the issues that Camarillo attempted to raise in the petition for postconviction relief could have been but were not raised on direct appeal and, pursuant to 46-21-105, could not be brought in the petition for postconviction relief. In addition, under this section, petitions for postconviction relief must be filed within 1 year of final judgment. Camarillo's petition was not filed until more than 3 years after judgment and thus was untimely. The District Court was affirmed. Camarillo v. St., 2005 MT 29, 326 M 35, 107 P3d 1265 (2005).

Evidence Provided at Trial Not Considered Newly Discovered Evidence — Postconviction Claim Time-Barred: Oatman failed to bring a claim for postconviction relief within the 5-year statute of limitations under the 1993 version of this section that was in effect at the time of conviction, so the claim was time-barred. Nevertheless, Oatman contended that the claim should be considered based on newly discovered evidence that a victim had contradicted the allegation of robbery. However, the jury heard the testimony at trial, so the evidence could not be considered to be newly discovered. The alleged new evidence did not extend the statute of limitations, so denial of Oatman's claim was proper. Oatman v. St., 2004 MT 360, 324 M 472, 104 P3d 1048 (2004).

No Claim of Actual Innocence — Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Precluded: Oatman asserted that his counsel was ineffective in failing to bring a claim of Oatman's actual innocence during Oatman's first appeal. However, Oatman had no claim of actual innocence, so there was no need for counsel to bring the claim on appeal. Counsel diligently represented Oatman before and throughout trial and the first appeal, and Oatman's continued employment of counsel indicated that Oatman was satisfied with his representation. Oatman's ineffective assistance claim failed. Oatman v. St., 2004 MT 360, 324 M 472, 104 P3d 1048 (2004).

Right to Appeal Error in Length of Sentence Lost by Failing to File Petition Within Statutory Time Limit: Pena, who was 17 years of age at the time, was sentenced as an adult to 45 years in prison for deliberate homicide and aggravated burglary. Pena did not challenge the legality of his sentence on direct appeal, but more than a year after entering a guilty plea and being sentenced, Pena filed a petition alleging that his sentence was illegal because the Montana Youth Court Act provided that a youth could not be sentenced to the custody of the Department of Corrections for more than 5 years and therefore the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to impose a longer sentence. Pena argued that the lack of subject matter jurisdiction was not subject to any statutory postconviction time limits for filing appeals and could be raised at any time. The Supreme Court held that an error in sentencing does not divest a court of subject matter jurisdiction over the case before it. The Supreme Court further held that all postconviction claims, both jurisdictional and nonjurisdictional, must be brought within the 1-year time limit provided by statute and that the time limit was jurisdictional and was not waived by the state's failure to raise the issue in District Court. Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004). Pena was overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Pena held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Discretion of District Court to Set Time for Filing Amended Petition for Postconviction Relief: Sellner timely filed a petition for postconviction relief and subsequently filed an amended petition more than 2 years after the original petition was filed. The state contended that under Maier v. St., 2003 MT 144, 316 M 181, 69 P3d 1194 (2003), the amended petition was untimely because it was not filed within 1 year after final conviction. The Supreme Court declined to apply Maier because Maier involved the time limit applicable to the discovery of new evidence, which did not apply here. Instead, the court applied the third sentence of 46-21-105(1)(a), which allows the District Court discretion to set deadlines as it sees fit as long as that discretion is not abused or is not subject to the new evidence deadline. Thus, Sellner's amended petition was not procedurally barred. Sellner v. St., 2004 MT 205, 322 M 310, 95 P3d 708 (2004).

Untimely Petition for Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: Judgment in Davis's aggravated kidnapping case was filed on January 12, 2001, and because Davis did not appeal, the judgment became final on March 13, 2001. Davis then had 1 year to file a petition for postconviction relief, but a petition was not filed until May 28, 2002. The District Court properly dismissed the petition as untimely because it was filed 76 days beyond the deadline. Davis v. St., 2004 MT 112, 321 M 118, 88 P3d 1285 (2004).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Time-Barred Absent Showing of Exceptions: Sanchez was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to life in prison. Sentence was imposed on November 14, 1997, and Sanchez had 60 days to appeal. Sanchez filed no direct appeal, and sentence was final on January 13, 1998, for purposes of postconviction proceedings. Sanchez first filed for postconviction relief on August 31, 2000, and filed an amended petition for postconviction relief on December 5, 2002. Although this section allowed 5 years for filing for postconviction relief when the crime was committed, the section was amended in 1997 and allowed only a 1-year period for filing when Sanchez's conviction became final and when the petitions were filed. Thus, Sanchez's first filing was 1½ years late, and the amended petition was nearly 4 years late. Absent a showing that any exceptions to the statutory time bar applied, such as newly discovered evidence or that a miscarriage of justice occurred, Sanchez's petitions for postconviction relief were properly denied as untimely. Sanchez v. St., 2004 MT 9, 319 M 226, 86 P3d 1 (2004).

Alleged New Evidence Not Extending Statutory Time Bar for Postconviction Relief:

Raugust contended that the period for filing for postconviction relief should be extended based on newly discovered evidence that the state mishandled a weapon found at the crime scene and that a key eyewitness confessed to the offense while waiting in the County Attorney's office to testify in Raugust's trial and because of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Raugust could not establish that the evidence regarding the weapon was so material that it would probably produce a different result at trial or that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. Evidence regarding the eyewitness directly conflicted with other evidence given at trial that tended to preclude the possibility that the eyewitness could have committed the crime, nor could Raugust show that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. The claims of ineffective counsel were not newly discovered evidence because Raugust was aware of the asserted deficiencies at trial. Raugust v. St., 2003 MT 367, 319 M 97, 82 P3d 890 (2003), following St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

Abe was found guilty of accountability for deliberate homicide and was sentenced to 60 years in prison. One year and 14 days after the deadline, Abe filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence. Allegedly, two jurors from Abe's trial sat in on the trial of Abe's coconspirator and heard two of the state's witnesses testify differently than they did in Abe's trial. The Supreme Court applied the factors to be considered when a District Court evaluates a motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence as set out in St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215 (1997) (see also St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959)), including the requirement that the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the defendant since trial and the requirement that the evidence must not be such as will tend only to impeach the character or credit of a witness. Here, Abe's counsel knew about the alleged discrepancies after Abe's trial but prior to Abe's appeal, so the discrepancies in testimony could have been raised on direct appeal. Further, the petition for postconviction relief alleged that the discrepancies undermined the credibility of the witnesses but did not establish that Abe did not engage in the criminal conduct for which he was convicted. Thus, the District Court concluded, and the Supreme Court agreed, that the alleged new evidence did not serve to extend the statutory bar for filing a petition for postconviction relief beyond the 1-year period in this section. Although Abe correctly pointed out that the state did not raise the issue of the statutory bar in District Court and that the District Court did not rule on the issue, the general rule that the Supreme Court will not address issues raised for the first time on appeal did not apply in this case because that rule does not apply when the issue is jurisdictional. The 1-year statute of limitations for postconviction relief is a jurisdictional limit, and lack of subject matter jurisdiction may be raised at any time under former Rule 12(h), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). Dismissal of Abe's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed as procedurally barred. St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001).

Period for Petitioning U.S. Supreme Court Commences Upon Date of Final Decision in Montana Supreme Court, Not From Date of Issuance of Remittitur: In calculating the timeliness of a petition for postconviction relief, the 90-day period for petitioning the U.S. Supreme Court begins on the date that a final decision is rendered by the Montana Supreme Court, not on the date of the issuance of remittitur from the Montana court. In the present case, the District Court incorrectly calculated the period as running from the date of remittitur when denying Raugust's petition for postconviction relief, but the decision was affirmed because the petition was nevertheless untimely even when the correct date of final decision was applied. Raugust v. St., 2003 MT 367, 319 M 97, 82 P3d 890 (2003).

Actual Innocence Standard Applied to Postconviction Claim Based on Incomplete DNA Results at Trial — Burden of Postconviction Statute of Limitations Met: Pope's petition for postconviction relief was denied by the District Court as barred by the 5-year statute of limitations in the 1993 version of this section (now 1 year) and because the issues were not raised on direct appeal. The court concluded that the jurisdictional bar could be overcome only by a clear miscarriage of justice and that the exception did not apply unless Pope did not commit the offense. The court relied on an inadmissible confession that Pope committed the crime, reasoning that even if the confession was not admissible at trial, it could be considered in a postconviction proceeding because it refuted Pope's claim of innocence. Pope contended that the exception applied because newly available DNA evidence tended to show that he did not commit the crime. The Supreme Court reversed. Based on Murray v. Carrier, 477 US 478 (1986), a petitioner must demonstrate that a constitutional violation at trial has probably resulted in conviction of an individual who is actually innocent and the claim must be supported by new evidence that indicates that the individual is innocent. Montana case law provides that the miscarriage of justice must be so obvious that the judgment is rendered a complete nullity and that the exception does not apply unless the defendant did not commit the crime from which relief is sought. Further, under Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), actual innocence requires that no reasonable, properly instructed juror would have found the defendant guilty. Schlup also allows review only of the record and new evidence to determine what a reasonable juror would find, so the District Court improperly relied on the failed plea confession to determine that Pope was not actually innocent. Pope correctly pointed out that the use of "and/or" language in the jury instructions made it impossible to determine whether Pope was convicted of raping one or two women. Thus, Pope satisfied the Schlup actual innocence burden in light of the complete DNA report, and when coupled with the error of using "and/or" language in the alternative charge, the jury instructions, and the verdict, waiver of the time bar in this section was required by the clear miscarriage of justice, warranting reversal. St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P3d 1232 (2003). See also St. v. Beach, 2013 MT 130, 370 Mont. 163, 302 P.3d 47.

Miscarriage of Justice Exception to Statute of Limitations for Postconviction Relief Applicable Only to Claim of Discovery of New Evidence — Recanted Victim Testimony Not Considered New Evidence: Maier cited 12 grounds for postconviction relief, including a claim alleging that newly discovered evidence in the form of the victim's recantation established that Maier did not commit attempted deliberate homicide. The District Court held that 10 of the claims were procedurally barred by 46-21-105, that 1 claim was improper under the facts of the case, and that the final claim of newly discovered evidence merited a response by the state. The state contended that the final claim was barred by this section because it was not raised within 1 year of final judgment. The District Court rejected the state's argument, but denied the claim anyway, and Maier appealed. The Supreme Court considered the nexus between 46-21-105 and this section, which address amendments to petitions for postconviction relief and require that amended claims alleging the existence of newly discovered evidence be filed within 1 year of final conviction or within 1 year of the time that the petitioner discovered or reasonably should have discovered the existence of the evidence, whichever is later. In this case, Maier discovered the evidence when the victim of the attempted deliberate homicide recanted testimony given at trial, but Maier's amended petition was not filed until more than 2 years after the recantation. Under St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001), the 1-year statute of limitation may be waived only if justified by a clear miscarriage of justice that renders the judgment a complete nullity, and under St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313 (2000), the newly discovered evidence must establish that the defendant did not commit the offense for the miscarriage of justice exception to apply. Here, the victim never actually stated that Maier was not the person who shot him, but only mentioned that he could not see the shooter because he was hiding. However, two other persons testified that Maier was the shooter, so the recanted testimony did not in itself establish that Maier did not commit attempted deliberate homicide. Thus, the miscarriage of justice exception did not apply, Maier's petition was not timely, and the District Court erred by not denying the claim on procedural grounds. Nevertheless, the proper result was reached, if for the wrong reason, so the District Court was sustained. Maier v. St., 2003 MT 144, 316 M 181, 69 P3d 1194 (2003).

One-Year Limitation on All Postconviction Proceedings, Including Second or Subsequent Petitions — Exception: Defendant contended that the 1-year period of limitation in this section applies only to an initial or original petition for postconviction relief, not to a second or subsequent petition. The Supreme Court disagreed. The 1-year period of limitation applies to the initiation of all postconviction proceedings, including those initiated by a second or subsequent petition. Further, under 46-21-105, in order to avoid dismissal, a second or subsequent petition must also demonstrate good cause why its claims were not asserted in the original petition. A narrow exception to the 1-year limitation period is allowed under subsection (2) of this section, which provides that a petition that alleges newly discovered evidence may be filed 1 year after the evidence was discovered or reasonably should have been discovered. St. v. Root, 2003 MT 28, 314 M 186, 64 P3d 1035 (2003).

Postconviction Relief Based on Claims of Newly Discovered Evidence Consisting of Defendant's Own Exculpatory Statements Properly Denied: Almost 2 years after pleading guilty to drug charges, Graham sought postconviction relief, contending that at the time that he pleaded guilty, he believed that he was admitting possessing only two drugs, not four, and that he was thus innocent of possessing the four drugs mentioned in the information. Graham also asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not advise him that he was pleading guilty to possession of all four drugs, and that his plea was thus not made knowingly and voluntarily. Despite the untimely filing of the petition, the District Court considered the petition because the issues were significant and should be disposed of on the merits. Nevertheless, the petition was dismissed and Graham appealed. The Supreme Court noted that in order to waive the 1-year statute of limitations on petitions for postconviction relief, the petitioner must provide newly discovered evidence that demonstrates actual innocence, which must be a showing that no reasonable juror would have found the defendant guilty rather than a mere showing that reasonable doubt exists. Graham did not show a clear miscarriage of justice because his own exculpatory statements did not qualify as newly discovered evidence and were insufficient to establish Graham's actual innocence. Additionally, Graham's allegations that he received ineffective assistance of counsel were record-based and did not qualify as new evidence of actual innocence. Last, Graham's request to withdraw the guilty plea because it was not made knowingly or voluntarily was considered. The Supreme Court applied the factors in 46-16-105 and found that the trial court's interrogation was adequate, the motion to withdraw was not timely, and the plea bargain provided Graham a considerable benefit in exchange for dismissal of other charges. Therefore, the plea was knowing and voluntary and did not provide grounds for postconviction relief. The denial of Graham's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. St. v. Graham, 2002 MT 237, 311 M 500, 57 P3d 54 (2002).

No Jurisdiction of District Court to Consider Postconviction Relief Upon Failure to File Petition Within Statutory Period: Carson sought relief from an amended sentencing order entered August 3, 1998. The amended sentencing order became final in October 1998, once the 60-day period for appeal expired. Carson filed the petition for postconviction relief on July 5, 2000, which was clearly beyond the 1-year period prescribed in this section for filing for postconviction relief. Thus, the District Court did not err in concluding that it did not have jurisdiction to entertain Carson's petition. St. v. Carson, 2002 MT 234, 311 M 485, 56 P3d 844 (2002).

Retroactivity of Substantive and Procedural Rules Distinguished — Nichols Rule Prohibiting Retroactive Applicability of Guillaume Sentencing Enhancement Restriction Overruled: Whitehorn was convicted in 1995 of felony assault, criminal endangerment, and possession of dangerous drugs, and the sentencing court added an additional 10-year sentence for use of a weapon. In 1999, the Supreme Court decided St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), which held that enhancing a defendant's sentence for use of a weapon when the underlying offense (felony assault in Guillaume's case) required proof of the use of a weapon violated the constitutional double jeopardy provision. Whitehorn moved for resentencing in light of Guillaume, arguing that the enhanced sentence should be stricken because his underlying offense of felony assault also required proof that he used a weapon. The state initially agreed that Guillaume applied and that resentencing was appropriate, but prior to resentencing, the state changed its position in light of St. v. Aguilar, 1999 MT 159, 295 M 133, 983 P2d 345 (1999), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093 (1999), which provided that Guillaume would not be retroactively applied to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when that opinion was issued. Whitehorn then filed a petition for postconviction relief under this section, arguing that his case was not final because he had not exhausted the 5-year time period for filing for postconviction relief (revised to 1 year in 1997). The District Court agreed that the petition was timely filed under this section, but, relying on Nichols, denied the petition and held that Whitehorn's case was final and not pending on direct review, and thus concluded that Guillaume could not be retroactively applied. Whitehorn appealed the denial of his petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court found that the District Court erred in not retroactively applying Guillaume and reversed, holding that under the common-law doctrine of plain error, Whitehorn was not procedurally barred from raising the retroactivity argument on appeal. The court distinguished between substantive and procedural rules when considering whether to apply a rule change retroactively. In Nichols, the court adopted the retroactivity analysis in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288 (1989), which stands for the proposition that on collateral review, a new procedural rule of constitutional law will not be applied retroactively if it puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe or if the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute a watershed rule of criminal procedure. In Nichols, the court concluded that Guillaume announced a new rule, but that neither Teague exception applied. However, here the court decided that Guillaume was by its own terms a substantive rule to which the Teague exceptions should not even have been applied (accord, Chambers v. U.S., 22 F3d 939 (9th Cir. 1994)). Partially overruling Nichols and a similar holding in St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), the court concluded that it was illogical to refuse to extend constitutional protections to citizens simply because their claims are raised by collateral review rather than direct appeal. However, the court retained the Guillaume analysis, clarifying that sentences on convictions for felony assault with a weapon and aggravated burglary are the only offenses that may not be enhanced under 46-18-221. St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also Desist v. U.S., 394 US 244 (1969), and Mackey v. U.S., 401 US 667 (1971).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Barred by Seven-Year Lapse: Following remand of St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514 (1993), in 1993, the District Court set forth findings of fact supporting Morrison's 3-year dangerous offender sentence that had been added to Morrison's 20-year prison sentence for sexual intercourse without consent, and Morrison's sentence became final. In 2000, Morrison petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that the 3-year sentence enhancement should be vacated because the use of a weapon had not been charged as a separate offense in the information and that the court relied on false or misleading evidence to support the enhancement. The court treated the petition as one for postconviction relief and denied it as untimely. Morrison appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the version of this section in effect at the time of Morrison's final conviction in 1993, the statute of limitations required that petitions for postconviction relief be filed within 5 years after conviction became final. Morrison's petition was not filed until 7 years after conviction. Notwithstanding Morrison's argument that the statute of limitations should be equitably tolled, the petition was not timely and the District Court properly dismissed it. Morrison v. Mahoney, 2002 MT 21, 308 M 196, 41 P3d 320 (2002). See also Thomas v. Doe, 2011 MT 283, 362 Mont. 454, 266 P.3d 1255, which held the Supreme Court will no longer consider as an original petition a party's appeal from a District Court's denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

Postconviction Relief Barred by Statute of Limitations — Inapplicability of Civil Tolling Provisions in Postconviction Proceeding: Placzkiwicz pleaded guilty in 1992 to felony arson and was sentenced to 20 years in prison with 15 suspended. Following release to begin serving the suspended sentence, Placzkiwicz had four revocation hearings for various probation violations, until the remaining term was 10 years with no time suspended. Placzkiwicz later requested to file a petition for postconviction relief to challenge the original sentence, but the request was denied as time-barred. Placzkiwicz appealed, contending that the statute of limitations should be tolled pursuant to 27-2-401 to include months of incarceration, plus the 5-year limitations period in this section (reduced to 1 year in 1997). The Supreme Court noted that the statutory time bar may be waived when there is a clear miscarriage of justice and the petitioner provides newly discovered evidence that demonstrates actual innocence, but Placzkiwicz failed to satisfy the exception. Placzkiwicz's argument that the civil tolling provisions in 27-2-401 should apply also failed because that section does not apply to postconviction proceedings, despite the fact that such proceedings are civil in nature. Rather, the Legislature has provided a specific statute of limitations in this section for postconviction proceedings, and that specific provision controls over other statutes of limitations. The District Court's ruling that the petition was time-barred was affirmed. St. v. Placzkiwicz, 2001 MT 254, 307 M 189, 36 P3d 934 (2001).

Retroactive Effect of Statute of Limitations on Petitions for Postconviction Relief: In 1997, the Legislature revised procedures for seeking postconviction relief, including a reduction in the statute of limitations for filing a petition from 5 years to 1 year after the date of final conviction. The revised statute of limitations was made to apply retroactively to all convictions occurring during the 12 months prior to the April 24, 1997, effective date of the amendments. Because this procedural change neither altered the definition of a crime nor increased a petitioner's punishment, the amended statute of limitations was not subject to the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto legislation. Wright's conviction fell within the period of retroactive applicability, so Wright had until April 24, 1998, to file a petition for postconviction relief, but did not file until November 16, 2000, in violation of the statute of limitations. The postconviction statute of limitations is a jurisdictional limit on litigation that will be waived by the Supreme Court only when there is a clear miscarriage of justice so obvious as to render the judgment void, and the miscarriage of justice exception does not apply to postconviction claims unless a constitutional violation has resulted in the conviction of an innocent person or unless newly discovered evidence establishes innocence. Wright raised neither of those issues, so the Supreme Court declined to waive the statute of limitations. The District Court's denial of Wright's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 247, 307 M 100, 38 P3d 772 (2001).

Appeal to Montana Supreme Court Not Final Until Time for Petitioning U.S. Supreme Court Expires — Improper Dismissal of Petition for Postconviction Relief as Time-Barred: Following conviction on numerous felony charges, Whitlow appealed his conviction and sentence, but did not raise concerns about ineffective assistance of counsel in the appeal. The conviction and sentence were upheld by the Montana Supreme Court, and Whitlow subsequently petitioned for postconviction relief, claiming that he was denied the right to effective assistance of counsel when his trial counsel failed to ask followup questions during voir dire. The District Court held that the petition was time-barred by the 1-year statute of limitations in this section, because it was filed over 1 year after the conviction was affirmed and a request for rehearing was denied by the Montana Supreme Court. Whitlow appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Under subsection (1)(b) of this section, if an appeal of a conviction is taken to the Montana Supreme Court, the conviction does not become final for purposes of the statute of limitations on postconviction relief petitions until the time for petitioning for review by the U.S. Supreme Court has expired. In this case, that time limit for petitioning the federal court occurred less than 1 year before Whitlow filed his petition for postconviction relief, so dismissal of the petition on grounds that it was time-barred was erroneous. St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Both Procedurally and Time Barred: Wells pleaded guilty to felony assault, and the District Court entered its written judgment and sentence on January 2, 1998. Wells did not appeal, and the time for filing an appeal expired 60 days later, on March 3, 1998, which became the date of final conviction. In order to come within the 1-year period for a petition for postconviction relief, Wells needed to file by March 3, 1999, but the petition was not filed until December 22, 1999, when Wells asserted a double jeopardy claim for weapons enhancement based on St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999). The District Court dismissed the petition as untimely. Wells argued on appeal that the 1-year limitation is not a jurisdictional limitation, but rather a statute of limitations subject to equitable tolling, and contended that a tolling should be applied to the time period that Wells was incarcerated in New Mexico without adequate legal assistance. The Supreme Court recalled the holding in St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313 (2000), when it was held that the postconviction statute of limitations is indeed a jurisdictional limit on litigation to be waived only if there is a clear miscarriage of justice and defendant alleges newly discovered evidence that defendant did not commit the offense. Wells presented no new evidence of innocence. Further, Wells could have raised the Guillaume claim on direct appeal, but did not. Wells' petition was thus both procedurally and time-barred. St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), to the extent that Wells was barred from raising a double jeopardy claim in a petition for postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-105 for failing to raise the issue on direct appeal, and overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Wells held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed Twelve Years After Conviction Time Barred — Guillaume Inapplicable: Charlo was convicted of aggravated assault in 1986 and sentenced to 20 years plus 10 years for use of a weapon, and the sentence was affirmed in 1987 (see St. v. Charlo, 226 M 213, 735 P2d 278 (1987)). Following the decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Charlo petitioned for postconviction relief in 1999 on grounds that the imposition of the additional 10-year weapon enhancement sentence violated his double jeopardy rights. The District Court concluded that Guillaume did not apply and that no miscarriage of justice would occur if the court applied the 5-year statute of limitations on postconviction relief provided in this section (now 1 year). The Supreme Court concurred. A petition filed 12 years after final conviction clearly violated the statute of limitations in this section. The court relied on St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), for the holding that application of the weapon enhancement provision in 46-18-221 to a conviction in which the underlying offense does not require use of a weapon as an element of the crime does not constitute a double jeopardy violation. The offense of aggravated assault does not require use of a weapon, so Guillaume did not apply. The court also declined to apply the fundamental miscarriage of justice exception in St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622 (1999). Guillaume was the sole basis of Charlo's petition, so Charlo could not show that the Redcrow exception would apply. St. v. Charlo, 2000 MT 192, 300 M 435, 4 P3d 1201, 57 St. Rep. 761 (2000).

Miscarriage of Justice Exception — Newly Discovered Evidence Necessary to Trigger Waiver of Postconviction Statute of Limitations: Rosales's deferred sentence for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and use of a weapon was revoked in 1994 because Rosales violated the deferral conditions. He was sentenced to 10 years for assault and an additional 2 years for use of a weapon in violation of 46-18-221. About 5 years and 3 months later and about 2½ months after the decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Rosales moved to amend the sentence, contending that the additional 2-year sentence for use of a weapon put him in double jeopardy, based on Guillaume. The District Court dismissed the motion because of the running of the 5-year statute of limitations for postconviction relief in this section (changed to a 1-year statute of limitations in 1997). On appeal, Rosales asked the Supreme Court to reverse its application of the statute of limitations and the bar against retroactive application of the law as established in a similar case, St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093 (1999), which procedurally barred a defendant from moving the court to amend the sentence based on Guillaume. The Supreme Court declined, holding that the postconviction statute of limitations is a jurisdictional limit on litigation and is waived only when there is a clear miscarriage of justice—one so obvious that the judgment is rendered a complete nullity. The miscarriage of justice exception refers to actual, not legal, innocence and does not apply to postconviction claims unless the defendant alleges newly discovered evidence establishing that the defendant did not commit the offense. The Supreme Court refused to alter the conditions upon which the statute of limitations will be waived, and because the District Court was affirmed on grounds that the statute of limitations had run, Rosales's argument regarding retroactive application of the law was not considered. St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313, 57 St. Rep. 385 (2000).

Exceptions to General Rule of Retroactivity — Guillaume Inapplicable to Case Finalized Before Adoption of New Constitutional Rule: Although Nichols' conviction, resulting in an enhanced penalty for use of a weapon, was finalized more than 5 years prior to the Supreme Court's decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), which created a new constitutional rule barring enhanced weapon sentences when the underlying offense requires proof of use of a weapon, Nichols nevertheless argued that the portion of his sentence precluded by Guillaume should be stricken from his sentence. The Supreme Court applied the retroactivity criteria in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), noting that two exceptions apply to the general rule of retroactivity. The first exception applies when the constitutional rule puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe; the second exception applies when the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute watershed rules of criminal procedure. Finding that Guillaume was not dictated by prior precedent and did not set out a watershed rule, the court held that the new rule did not require retroactive application to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when the Guillaume opinion was issued. Not only was Nichols' claim time-barred under the pre-1997 version of this section, his argument that the sentence should be reduced to prevent a miscarriage of justice also failed because miscarriage of justice refers to actual, not legal, innocence. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), followed in St. v. Baker, 1999 MT 251, 296 M 253, 989 P2d 335, 56 St. Rep. 987 (1999), and overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Death Row Not Considered Cruel and Unusual Punishment — Delay Attributed to Defendant's Appeals: Citing Lackey v. Tex., 514 US 1045, 131 L Ed 2d 304, 115 S Ct 1421 (1995), Gollehon claimed that his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated by the amount of time that he spent on death row and by the number of sentencing hearings in his capital murder case. The Supreme Court declined to apply Lackey because the majority of the delay in Gollehon's case was caused by his own pursuit of constitutional and statutory rights in state and federal courts and was not caused by the state. Gollehon's claim for relief was denied. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999). See also St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996).

"Conviction" Based on Verdict and Sentence in District Court — Petition for Postconviction Relief Time-Barred: Redcrow was convicted in February 1988, and sentence was imposed in October 1988. Following affirmation of the conviction by the Supreme Court in 1990, Redcrow filed a petition for postconviction relief in District Court in March 1995. The petition was denied as untimely. Redcrow appealed, asserting that the date of conviction was in 1990 on the date on which the Supreme Court affirmed the original murder conviction in St. v. Redcrow, 242 M 254, 790 P2d 449, 47 St. Rep. 672 (1990), rather than the date of the District Court conviction in 1988, which would render the statutory filing bar inapplicable. Applying the definition of "conviction" in 45-2-101 and Beach v. Day, 275 M 370, 913 P2d 622, 53 St. Rep. 184 (1996), the Supreme Court held that Redcrow was considered convicted when the jury rendered the guilty verdict and sentence was imposed in District Court in 1988; thus, the petition for postconviction relief, filed 6½ years later, was time-barred under the 1988 version of this section. St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622, 56 St. Rep. 409 (1999).

Waiver of Statute of Limitations Not Justified — No Clear Miscarriage of Justice: Redcrow was convicted in February 1988, and sentence was imposed in October 1988. Following affirmation of the conviction by the Supreme Court in 1990, Redcrow filed a petition for postconviction relief in District Court in March 1995. The petition was denied as untimely. The District Court held that although the petition was not filed within the 5-year statute of limitations in this section, as it read in 1988, the exception to the procedural bar allowed the state to examine the record to ascertain whether a constitutional violation resulted in a fundamental miscarriage of justice that would render the judgment a nullity. The court then examined the record, concluded that no constitutional violation occurred, and denied the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that a fundamental miscarriage of justice arises only when a jury could find, in light of new evidence, that the defendant is actually innocent of the crime. In Redcrow's case, defendant confessed and admitted to the crime of murder, which eliminated the possibility of innocence. Further, all of Redcrow's claims regarding ineffective assistance of counsel were record-based and not properly described as new evidence. Because the claims could have been presented prior to expiration of the 5-year statute of limitations, relief was barred. St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622, 56 St. Rep. 409 (1999). See also St. v. Beach, 2013 MT 130, 370 Mont. 163, 302 P.3d 47.

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims Barred as Untimely:

Hawkins contended that his petition for postconviction relief was not time-barred because of ineffective counsel at his trial more than 20 years prior, asserting that witnesses whom his attorney failed to discover would have offered mitigating testimony that Hawkins had been under extreme mental and emotional stress and was provoked into murdering his wife. However, because Hawkins' original trial counsel was since deceased, a miscarriage of justice would have resulted if Hawkins were allowed to make a claim on the merits when the state's primary witness was no longer available. Thus, the claim was time-barred. Hawkins v. Mahoney, 1999 MT 82, 294 M 124, 979 P2d 697, 56 St. Rep. 345 (1999).

Claims of ineffective assistance of counsel and confession-related claims raised in a petition for postconviction relief filed 11 years after conviction were barred as untimely. Beach v. Day, 275 M 370, 913 P2d 622, 53 St. Rep. 184 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988).

"Newly Discovered" Evidence, Discoverable at Trial, Not New — Claim Time-Barred: Hawkins contended that his petition for postconviction relief was not time-barred because of newly discovered evidence of ineffective counsel at his trial more than 20 years prior, asserting that witnesses whom his attorney failed to discover would have offered mitigating testimony that Hawkins had been under extreme mental and emotional stress and was provoked into murdering his wife. However, rather than being newly discovered, the evidence of Hawkins' mental state was available at the time of trial through Hawkins himself, despite the fact that he did not testify at trial. Thus, the claim was time-barred. Hawkins v. Mahoney, 1999 MT 82, 294 M 124, 979 P2d 697, 56 St. Rep. 345 (1999).

Statute of Limitations on Petition for Postconviction Relief to Run From Time of Filing, Not Conviction: The statute of limitations applicable to Hawkins when he was convicted in 1973 provided that a petition for postconviction relief could be filed any time after conviction. In 1981, the time period was changed to require filing within 5 years of conviction. Hawkins' petition for postconviction relief, filed in 1997, was subject to the 5-year statute of limitations in effect at the time of filing, not the one in effect at the time of conviction. Hawkins v. Mahoney, 1999 MT 82, 294 M 124, 979 P2d 697, 56 St. Rep. 345 (1999).

"Motion to Vacate Conviction" Construed as Motion for Postconviction Relief and Not Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Attorney Conflict of Interests — Petition Previously Denied: Howard filed a motion for postconviction relief in 1993, asserting that his attorney in his 1981 trial for felony theft had a conflict of interests because the attorney also represented a codefendant. The Supreme Court denied his petition as time-barred under this section. Howard then filed with the District Court a "Motion to Vacate Conviction", which the District Court construed as another petition for postconviction relief and also denied as time-barred. The Supreme Court held that it was proper for the District Court to construe the "Motion to Vacate Conviction" as another motion for postconviction relief. Despite Howard's argument that his motion did not meet the formal prerequisites for a motion for postconviction relief and that motions to withdraw a guilty plea are allowed after judgment by virtue of 46-16-105, the Supreme Court held: (1) that it had not always strictly enforced the requirements for a motion for postconviction relief, especially for persons appearing pro se; (2) that the content of Howard's motion was of the type usually made in motions for postconviction relief; and (3) that although other means of review of a sentence other than postconviction relief may sometimes be necessary because of exigent circumstances, the circumstances of Howard's situation, in which he waited over 10 years to challenge his conviction the first time, did not demonstrate those exigent circumstances. The Supreme Court held that this petition, like Howard's first petition for postconviction relief, was time-barred by 46-21-101. St. v. Howard, 282 M 522, 938 P2d 710, 54 St. Rep. 464 (1997).

State Not Required to Wait Five Years to Execute Convict: Upon the dissolution of Gollehon's stay of execution, the District Court set a new execution date within 90 days of the hearing dissolving the stay, as required by 46-19-103. Gollehon argued that the state could not execute him prior to the expiration of the 5-year period provided in this section (see 1997 amendment) for petitioning for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court held that the provisions concerning postconviction relief do not override the statutory language requiring the setting of a new execution date upon the dissolution of a stay of execution. Gollehon v. District Court, 271 M 363, 897 P2d 1058, 52 St. Rep. 447 (1995), followed in State ex rel. Turner v. District Court, 271 M 392, 897 P2d 1060, 52 St. Rep. 498 (1995).

Motion for New Trial Based on Recantation by Accomplice Fifteen Years After Conviction: Some 15 years after defendant was convicted of second degree murder, an accomplice recanted his testimony, claiming that he, not defendant, committed the crime. Defendant then filed a motion for a new trial or other appropriate relief. The state argued the motion was essentially a petition for postconviction relief barred by the 5-year statute of limitations in this section. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that under such an interpretation a defendant held in violation of his constitutional rights would be deprived of a method of redress regardless of his diligence or the justness of his claim. Rather, the claim sounded in the nature of a petition for habeas corpus, and the court determined the single issue to be whether defendant was entitled to a new trial based on the proffered evidence of another person doing the crime for which defendant was convicted. St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268, 45 St. Rep. 1192 (1988), overruled, to the extent that Perry stands for the proposition that a trial judge is required to grant a new trial only when satisfied that the recantation of the witness is true, in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005). However, see In re Petition of Gray, 274 M 1, 908 P2d 1352, 52 St. Rep. 1041 (1995). Gray was overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Gray held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Postconviction Relief Petition Barred by Twenty-Five Year Lapse: A defendant, despite this section and notwithstanding the rule in In re McNair, 189 M 321, 615 P2d 916 (1980), that a petition for postconviction relief cannot be defeated by a claim of Statute of Limitations, res judicata, or laches, is barred from petitioning for postconviction relief if 25 years have elapsed between the conviction and the petition for postconviction relief. The passage of time may make it impracticable to retry a case if the motion is granted and a new trial is ordered. Long delay may raise a question of good faith. St. v. Standley, 192 M 54, 626 P2d 248, 38 St. Rep. 522 (1981).

Petition for Postconviction Relief — No Time Limitation: Petitioner applied for postconviction relief 8½ years after he was sentenced. The County Attorney contended that he was barred by laches from attempting to withdraw his guilty plea. The postconviction hearing statutes are an attempt by the Legislature to consolidate all of the common-law statutory remedies normally available to challenge a sentence. The Legislature did not intend to impose an absolute time constraint on the filing of an application for postconviction relief [until 1981, when a limit of 5 years from the date of conviction was set], and therefore laches does not apply. The length of delay may be considered, however, in viewing the good faith and credibility of the moving party. Petitioner claimed ineffective assistance of counsel and wished to withdraw his guilty plea. Nothing in the record indicated ineffective counsel, and the long delay makes the situation even less favorable to the petitioner. The application for postconviction relief was denied. In re McNair, 189 M 321, 615 P2d 916 (1980).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is identical to 1987 MCA 46-21-103, except that the opportunity for filing with the Clerk of the Supreme Court is eliminated. See 46-21-101(3), which authorizes the filing of a postconviction petition in the Supreme Court in situations in which the petitioner is in custody.

This section sets forth the process by which proceedings are commenced. It further provides that the venue is at the place of conviction and not the place of confinement. The advantages of having the venue at the place of conviction are: 1. It will reduce the burden of the courts at the place of confinement; 2. Since most of the witnesses who are called are likely to be found in the area of conviction, the cost of the proceedings will be reduced; 3. The convicting court is more familiar with the background and facts of the case. (See U.S. v. Hayman, 342 U.S. 205.) This section will be supplemented by rules of the Supreme Court.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In first sentence after "proceeding", inserted "for relief under 46-21-101" and at end substituted "appropriate court" for "court in which the conviction took place or the clerk of the supreme court"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Denial of Unsupported Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Abuse of Discretion: Although Hanson's verified petition satisfied the requirements of this section for commencing a proceeding for postconviction relief, it did not satisfy the separate requirement in 46-21-104 that evidence establishing the facts alleged to provide a basis for relief be attached to the petition. The unsupported petition was insufficient to entitle Hanson to an evidentiary hearing, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the petition. St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299, 56 St. Rep. 891 (1999).

This section describes what the petition should contain. The requirements that the petition shall also identify any previous proceedings the petitioner may have taken to secure relief from his conviction deserves special emphasis. This is intended to guide the district judge in exercising his discretion as to whether the relief available to the petitioner in this chapter shall be deemed waived. (See Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391)

Compiler's Comments

1997 Amendment: Chapter 302 in (1)(c), at beginning, inserted "identify all facts supporting the grounds for relief set forth in the petition" and at end substituted "establishing the existence of those facts" for "supporting its allegations or state why the evidence is not attached"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 17, 1997.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 302, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, it is the public policy of the State of Montana to provide persons accused of crimes with a fair and speedy trial and direct appellate review of legal issues fairly presented to the trial court; and

WHEREAS, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is preserved by Article II, section 19, of the Montana Constitution; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has set forth in Title 46, chapter 21, MCA, procedures for protecting an offender's right to postconviction review of the judgment; and

WHEREAS, there is no federal constitutional right to a specific statutorily prescribed postconviction procedure; and

WHEREAS, it is the Legislature's intent that decisions of Montana juries and judgments of Montana trial courts in criminal cases, including death penalty cases, be respected and given finality by other reviewing courts unless errors affecting an offender's substantial rights have occurred; and

WHEREAS, amendments to Montana's postconviction relief and death penalty statutes will further the goal of finality by codifying certain interpretations of those statutes by the Montana Supreme Court and clarifying legislative intent with respect to other provisions.

THEREFORE, it is the policy of the State of Montana to prescribe and limit, consistent with constitutional safeguards of the criminal justice process, the authority of an appellate or other reviewing court to consider legal and factual issues determined by the trial or sentencing court."

Severability: Section 5, Ch. 302, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "petition", inserted "for postconviction relief"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Deleted "Arguments" and inserted "The petition must be accompanied by a supporting memorandum including appropriate arguments" at the beginning of the last sentence; deleted "shall be omitted from this petition" following "discussion of authorities" at the end of the last sentence.

Case Notes

Error in Placing Factual Allegations in Supporting Memorandum — Amendment of Petition for Postconviction Relief to Be Freely Given: Nava inadvertently placed his recitation of facts supporting his petition for postconviction relief (PCR) in his supporting memorandum rather than in his PCR petition. The Supreme Court held that leave to amend his PCR petition should be freely granted by the District Court and that to not do so was an elevation of form over substance. Nava v. St., 2011 MT 77, 360 Mont. 96, 255 P.3d 53.

Failure of Counsel to Poll Jury Regarding Exposure to Press Coverage of Trial Not Considered Ineffective Counsel — No Error in Failure to Hold Hearing on Request: Absent evidence that a juror might have been exposed to news accounts of a trial, counsel cannot be found to be outside the wide range of reasonable professional conduct for declining to request jury polling, nor may a trial court be found in error for failing to hold a hearing on the request. Robinson v. St., 2010 MT 108, 356 Mont. 282, 232 P.3d 403. See also St. v. Kirkland, 184 Mont. 229, 602 P.2d 586 (1979), and St. v. Cunningham, 2018 MT 56, 390 Mont. 408, 414 P.3d 289.

No Demonstration of Ineffective Counsel Based on Breakdown of Attorney-Client Relationship — Postconviction Relief Denied: Robinson sought postconviction relief on grounds that trial counsel was ineffective by not requesting a jury poll regarding the jury's exposure to a newspaper account of the trial, and because of a breakdown in the attorney-client relationship. On the issue of jury polling, the jury was admonished each day to avoid press coverage of the trial, and Robinson failed to identify a single fact to support the speculation that the jury ignored the admonishment or to establish any prejudice from counsel's failure to request jury polling. The fact that it may be possible to poll a jury does not mean that failure to poll the jury constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel. On the issue of attorney-client relationship, the Supreme Court cited St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 Mont. 215, 19 P.3d 817, for the holding that a defendant has a right to meaningful representation but not a right to a meaningful attorney-client relationship. In this case, counsel maintained communication with Robinson until just prior to trial when Robinson refused to speak further with counsel, and nothing in the record suggested that counsel's actual performance at trial was deficient. Robinson apparently initiated the breakdown in communication upon which the ineffective counsel claim was based, falling far short of a complete collapse of the relationship. The ineffective assistance claims failed the Strickland test and were denied. Robinson v. St., 2010 MT 108, 356 Mont. 282, 232 P.3d 403.

Postconviction Claim of Ineffective Counsel Unfounded — Evidentiary Hearing Not Required: Following Hamilton's conviction for felony incest, he filed for postconviction relief on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel and requested an evidentiary hearing. The District Court dismissed the claim without holding an evidentiary hearing and Hamilton appealed. The Supreme Court held that a hearing was not necessary because Hamilton failed to meet the threshold requirement that the petition identify facts justifying relief. The Supreme Court also held that Hamilton failed to state claims for relief. The court examined each of Hamilton's ineffective assistance claims and concluded that Hamilton failed to show that counsel's performance was constitutionally deficient or prejudicial in any way, including alleged failure to investigate and impeach witnesses, improper use of an expert, informing the jury during opening statements that Hamilton would testify when Hamilton decided not to testify, allowing an investigating officer to testify about interview techniques, and perceived adverse effects of counsel's alleged alcohol and drug use. Dismissal of Hamilton's petition was affirmed. Hamilton v. St., 2010 MT 25, 355 Mont. 133, 226 P.3d 588. See also Heath v. St., 2009 MT 7, 348 Mont. 361, 202 P.3d 118.

Second Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Procedurally or Time Barred: After a 1995 petition for postconviction relief was denied, Beach filed in 2008 for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence, but the District Court, without a hearing, denied the petition on grounds that it was procedurally and time barred. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The 2008 petition claimed that the newly discovered evidence was only recently available and thus could not have been raised in the 1995 petition. Since nothing indicated a lack of diligence on Beach's part in locating the new evidence, the Supreme Court granted Beach the benefit of the doubt as to whether he acted with sufficient alacrity in locating the new evidence, so the 2008 petition was not procedurally barred. To determine whether Beach would be entitled to a new trial based on newly discovered evidence, the court applied the criteria in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P.3d 1099 (2005), regarding a trial court's consideration of what impact new evidence might have when looking prospectively at a new trial with a new jury. The court concluded that the District Court abused its discretion by denying the petition without holding an evidentiary hearing on the new evidence. The case was remanded to allow a hearing to evaluate whether the evidence was actually newly discovered and whether a reasonable jury would have found Beach guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. The newly discovered evidence must be material to the issues at trial and neither cumulative nor merely impeaching, and in order to prevail on a substantive innocence claim, Beach was required to show by clear and convincing evidence that but for a procedural error, no reasonable juror would have found him guilty. Beach v. St., 2009 MT 398, 353 M 411, 220 P3d 667 (2009). See also Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622 (1999), and St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P3d 1232 (2003).

On remand, the District Court concluded that Beach had presented sufficient evidence of his actual innocence to warrant a new trial, and the state appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. To overcome the presumption of guilt that arises from a conviction at trial, an actual innocence petitioner must show that new reliable evidence — whether it be exculpatory scientific evidence, trustworthy eyewitness accounts, or critical physical evidence — when viewed against the trial evidence demonstrates the petitioner is actually innocent of the crime for which the petitioner was convicted. An actual innocence claim may be either substantive or procedural. A substantive innocence petitioner must show by clear and convincing evidence that no reasonable juror would find the petitioner guilty, whereas a procedural innocence petitioner must merely show that it is likely or probable that no reasonable jury would find the petitioner guilty. While a substantive innocence petitioner who satisfies the burden of proof is forever exonerated, a procedural innocence petitioner who satisfies the burden of proof merely avoids the application of procedural bars and is allowed to present claims of constitutional trial error at a postconviction hearing. After reviewing both the new and old evidence, the Supreme Court concluded that the District Court erred in considering only the new evidence and that Beach did not provide reliable evidence to demonstrate either substantive or procedural actual innocence. St. v. Beach, 2013 MT 130, 370 Mont. 163, 302 P.3d 47.

Death of Attorney Prior to Filing Response to Petition for Postconviction Relief — Unique Circumstance Warranting Evidentiary Hearing: Heath filed a timely petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court ordered the attorney to respond to the charges, but before a response was filed, the attorney died. Heath then requested an evidentiary hearing, but the request for a hearing was denied on grounds that the court failed to see the benefit of a hearing without the attorney in attendance, and the petition was denied without holding a hearing. Heath appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Although not all circumstances require the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing on a petition for postconviction relief, a hearing may be appropriate in certain settings with unique circumstances. The attorney's death prior to filing a court-ordered response constituted one of those unique circumstances. The record failed to set forth the attorney's reasons for pretrial and trial actions, and denial of a hearing left Heath without any alternative means of inquiry into the attorney's actions and whether those decisions supported Heath's ineffective assistance claims. Therefore, under these unique circumstances the Supreme Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing to provide Heath a reasonable alternative means to inquire into the attorney's reasons for the pretrial and trial actions and to allow the District Court to evaluate Heath's claims. Heath v. St., 2009 MT 7, 348 M 361, 202 P3d 118 (2009). See also Williams v. St., 2002 MT 189, 311 M 108, 53 P3d 864 (2002), and Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Required Before Request for Counsel Considered: Davis filed a motion requesting counsel to prepare postconviction proceedings. While the motion was pending, the time for filing a postconviction petition expired. The District Court denied the motion for counsel on grounds that the time for a postconviction petition had run. Although the court erred in its conclusion because 42 days remained for filing a petition when the motion for counsel was filed, the Supreme Court nevertheless affirmed because Davis was required to file a petition for postconviction relief before the motion for appointment of counsel could be considered. Absent a valid petition, the motion for counsel was properly denied. Davis v. St., 2007 MT 207, 339 M 1, 167 P3d 892 (2007).

Dismissal of Postconviction Petition for Failure to State Claim — Differentiation of Standards Applicable to Civil Cases — No Error in Failure to Hold Evidentiary Hearing on Postconviction Petition: Herman asserted that an evidentiary hearing should have been held regarding his petition for postconviction relief because the standard in 46-21-201 is nearly identical to the provision in former Rule 12(b)(6), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), so allegations in a petition for postconviction relief must be taken as true and construed in a light most favorable to the petitioner, requiring a hearing on the allegations. The Supreme Court disagreed. The express statutory requirements in this section significantly exceed and are inconsistent with the mere notice pleading requirements for an ordinary complaint in a civil action. Thus, the civil standards do not apply to dismissals of petitions for postconviction relief for failure to state a claim because the civil standards are inconsistent with the more specific requirements of 46-21-201 and this section, and the District Court did not err in failing to hold an evidentiary hearing on Herman's petition and in dismissing Herman's claim for failure to meet the procedural threshold in this section. Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006), following Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), and distinguishing St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), and St. v. Lawrence, 2001 MT 299, 307 M 487, 38 P3d 809 (2001).

Waiver of Right to Postconviction Challenge of Matters Occurring Prior to Guilty Plea and Unrelated to Nature of Plea: In a petition for postconviction relief, Herman raised numerous issues related to ineffective assistance of counsel that allegedly led to a guilty plea. However, by pleading guilty, Herman waived the right to challenge matters that occurred prior to the plea and that were unrelated to the voluntary or knowing nature of the plea or to the ineffective assistance claim, including: (1) a claim that Herman conducted, sought, or obtained independent legal research; (2) an assertion that Herman met the attachments requirement of subsection (1)(c) of this section; (3) Herman's claim that he pleaded guilty because of the duress of incarceration; (4) counsel's failure to move for a bond reduction or pretrial release; and (5) a claim that counsel was ineffective by asserting a speedy trial violation. Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006), following Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004).

Defense Counsel's Complaint to Media Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: While Ford was incarcerated awaiting trial, a family member of Ford's homicide victim visited Ford and caused a disruption. Ford's counsel issued a news release to local media contending that jail officials violated Ford's constitutional rights by allowing the incident to occur, and the local newspaper ran a story that contained counsel's accusation. Ford contended that counsel's conduct prejudiced the case by instigating negative media coverage that reduced Ford's chance of obtaining an impartial jury. However, Ford cited no authority in support of the claim that counsel's complaint to the media amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. Absent support by legal authority and evidence of prejudice, Ford's postconviction claim for relief was properly denied. Ford v. St., 2005 MT 151, 327 M 378, 114 P3d 244 (2005).

Failure of Counsel to Present Evidence of Purported Negligent Rescue Efforts Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In a petition for postconviction relief, Ford contended that his counsel was ineffective in failing to present evidence that Ford's beating victim may have been injured through the negligent rescue efforts of emergency personnel who responded at the scene. However, the trial record contained no evidence to support the claim, and Ford's arguments were based on mere allegations. Counsel could not be found to be ineffective for failing to raise a defense that was unsupported in the record, and Ford's claim for postconviction relief was properly denied. Ford v. St., 2005 MT 151, 327 M 378, 114 P3d 244 (2005).

Failure of Counsel to Suppress Unintroduced Evidence Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In a petition for postconviction relief, Ford contended that his counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress evidence of a blood sample taken from Ford's hands before a search warrant was obtained. However, the state introduced no blood evidence at trial, so there was no evidence for Ford's counsel to move to suppress. Ford's ineffective assistance of counsel claim failed. Ford v. St., 2005 MT 151, 327 M 378, 114 P3d 244 (2005).

Speculative Postconviction Claim Properly Denied: In a petition for postconviction relief, Ford contended that his counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress testimony from Ford's neighbors regarding statements by the neighbors that were allegedly coerced by police. However, the claim was based on nothing more than Ford's allegation that officers coerced statements from the neighbors. Because Ford produced no evidence to support the allegation and the claim was not grounded on facts in the record, the claim for relief was properly denied. Ford v. St., 2005 MT 151, 327 M 378, 114 P3d 244 (2005).

Unfounded and Unpleaded Speculative Argument Not Considered for First Time on Appeal: Kallowat contended for the first time on appeal that if the jury in his DUI case had known that the arresting officer had been convicted of a felony and was employed under questionable status, the case would in all probability have had a different outcome. However, Kallowat failed to properly plead the issue as required in this section, nor was this speculative contention supported by the record. Therefore, the Supreme Court declined to address Kallowat's unsupported argument raised for the first time on appeal. Kallowat v. St., 2004 MT 152, 321 M 501, 92 P3d 1176 (2004).

Failure to Provide Proof of Entitlement to Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied: Ellenburg raised several issues on appeal, some of which were raised in District Court and some of which were not. The Supreme Court declined to address all issues that were not preserved for appeal. Several other issues were procedurally barred because Ellenburg either raised them on direct appeal or reasonably could have raised them on direct appeal. Postconviction relief was denied on the remaining issues because Ellenburg waived the right to appeal those issues by failing to provide any evidentiary support for the allegations. The petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), following St. v. Schmalz, 1998 MT 210, 290 M 420, 964 P2d 763 (1998), St. v. Niederklopper, 2000 MT 187, 300 M 397, 6 P3d 448 (2000), and St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), and followed in Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Failure to State Claim or Present Facts Justifying Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied: Griffin petitioned for postconviction relief, asserting claims of prosecutorial misconduct, double jeopardy, judicial bias, and ineffective assistance of counsel. However, a petitioner has the burden of showing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that facts justify the relief. Here, Griffin failed to bolster the claims with supporting evidence, such as affidavits, records, or other evidence. Thus, the petition failed to meet the statutory requirements or state a claim for relief and was properly dismissed as a matter of law. Griffin v. St., 2003 MT 267, 317 M 457, 77 P3d 545 (2003). See also Kelly v. St., 2013 MT 21, 368 Mont. 309, 300 P.3d 120.

Dismissal of Procedurally Deficient Petition Proper: Finley filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, claiming ineffective assistance of counsel because the attorney failed to mention that Finley could challenge the validity of three prior unspecified DUI convictions during a trial for felony DUI. The petition was dismissed for failure to state a claim for relief. Finley appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Mere allegations do not constitute the evidence contemplated by this section, nor are unsupported allegations sufficient to entitle a petitioner to an evidentiary hearing. Claims of ineffective assistance of counsel must be grounded on facts in the record and not merely on conclusory allegations. Finley did not provide evidence in any form that would establish the facts underlying the assertions in the petition or provide an explanation for why the supporting evidence was not provided, which in this case would have included identification of the prior DUI convictions by court or cause number and other particulars. The petition was therefore procedurally deficient and was properly dismissed. St. v. Finley, 2002 MT 288, 312 M 493, 59 P3d 1132 (2002), following St. v. Kills On Top, 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182 (1996), and St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299 (1999), and distinguishing Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002 (1981), St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), St. v. Lawrence, 2001 MT 299, 307 M 487, 38 P3d 809 (2001), and Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002).

Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Failure to Appeal Sentence and Withholding Exculpatory Evidence — No Showing of Deficient Performance of Counsel: Wright contended in a petition for postconviction relief that he received ineffective assistance of counsel when his attorney failed to appeal the sentence after indicating to Wright that the sentence would be appealed and when counsel withheld exculpatory evidence from Wright prior to a change of plea hearing. Wright contended that counsel failed to mention that two of Wright's sexual assault victims made second statements that contradicted their original statements, which would have cleared Wright of 2 of the 11 charges against him. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test for ineffective assistance, which required Wright to first show that counsel's performance was deficient. By deposition, counsel in this case swore that he was never asked to appeal, and never indicated to Wright that the sentence would be appealed. The only evidence suggesting counsel's refusal to appeal was Wright's own affidavit. The District Court accepted counsel's statements, and that decision was not disturbed by the Supreme Court absent a showing of clear error. Further, the only support for Wright's contention that counsel withheld exculpatory evidence was Wright's own affidavit. Wright failed to produce the alleged revised statements or any records indicating that the victims even gave second statements; thus, Wright's affidavit was no more than a mere conclusory allegation unsupported by any evidence. The Supreme Court held that Wright failed to show that counsel's performance was deficient and declined to grant postconviction relief on the issue. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), followed in Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), and St. v. Godfrey, 2009 MT 60, 349 M 335, 203 P3d 834 (2009).

Postconviction Relief Barred Upon Failure to Raise Issue of Alleged Unlawful Sentences on Direct Appeal: In a petition for postconviction relief, Wright alleged three erroneous sentencing issues: (1) oral pronouncement of the sentence varied from the written sentence; (2) the District Court's nunc pro tunc order was improper; and (3) a sentencing condition ordering Wright to stay out of Custer County was illegal. However, Wright could have reasonably raised the sentencing issues before the District Court and on direct appeal, but chose not to do so. Thus, Wright was procedurally barred under 46-21-105(2) from raising the issues in postconviction relief. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Record Indicating Voluntary Nature of Guilty Plea — Postconviction Relief Barred When Ineffective Counsel Claim Could Have Been Raised on Direct Appeal: At a change of plea hearing, Wright pleaded guilty to 11 counts of sexual assault and was sentenced to 55 years in prison. The District Court suspended sentence on six counts. Wright did not file a direct appeal on any issue, but more than 1 year after sentencing, he filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, asserting that he was coerced into pleading guilty by his attorney. On the issue of the voluntariness of the guilty pleas, the Supreme Court looked to the record to determine whether this question of fact was documented in the District Court. In this case, there was ample indication in the record to determine that the issue of the voluntary nature of Wright's pleas and the propriety of counsel's representation were raised in District Court and documented. Wright could thus have raised the issue on direct appeal, but failing to do so, he was barred from raising the issue in a petition for postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-105. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Denial of Unsupported Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Abuse of Discretion: Although Hanson's verified petition satisfied the requirements of 46-21-103 for commencing a proceeding for postconviction relief, it did not satisfy the separate requirement in this section that evidence establishing the facts alleged to provide a basis for relief be attached to the petition. The unsupported petition was insufficient to entitle Hanson to an evidentiary hearing, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the petition. St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299, 56 St. Rep. 891 (1999).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Denied — No Due Process Violation — No Abuse of Discretion in Refusing New Trial Because All Factors Not Fulfilled — No New Trial: Sullivan, the director of the Parks and Recreation Department for the city of Great Falls, was convicted of three counts of felony theft of various city recreational fees and one count of tampering with public records. Later, the employee who replaced him found in a budget file an envelope containing $1,300 of city recreation funds. Sullivan brought a petition for postconviction relief, arguing that his constitutional rights under Brady v. Md., 373 US 83 (1963) (granting postconviction relief on the basis of evidence suppressed by the prosecution), had been violated and that the newly discovered evidence entitled him to a new trial. The Supreme Court held Brady inapplicable because the new evidence was not known to the prosecution at the time of the trial and therefore could not have been wrongfully withheld. In connection with the Brady claim, the Supreme Court also noted that Sullivan had not attached an affidavit or other evidence in support of his allegations, as required by this section, and concluded that Sullivan's assertions were not sufficient under 46-21-201 to allow him to conduct discovery or to entitle him to an evidentiary hearing. Because theft is not an element of tampering under 45-7-208 and 45-2-302, the Supreme Court concluded that Sullivan's conviction for tampering by making another employee alter official city records would not have been changed had the newly discovered evidence been available at trial. The Supreme Court also concluded that Sullivan had not fulfilled all of the six factors discussed in St. v. Cline, 275 M 46, 909 P2d 1171 (1996), required for grant of a new trial based upon newly discovered evidence because he had not shown that the new evidence would probably produce a different result at trial and that the new evidence was not merely cumulative evidence. Concerning Sullivan's final claim, the Supreme Court noted that in St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988), the defendant obtained newly discovered evidence but that neither a motion for a new trial nor postconviction relief was available to the defendant, so the Supreme Court created a "window" for review of the claim that otherwise would have been procedurally barred. The Supreme Court contrasted Perry and pointed out that in Sullivan's case, he was not barred from bringing a petition for postconviction relief. For all of these reasons, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's denial for postconviction relief and denial of Sullivan's motion for a new trial. St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Failure to Supply Supporting Materials: Petitioner failed to present any affidavits, records, or other evidence to establish the testimony of a proposed witness, to establish the availability of the witness, and to present any statement as to why affidavits, records, or other evidence was not attached. Lack of the presentation of supporting evidence was a factor in the denial of a petition for postconviction relief. Eiler v. St., 254 M 39, 833 P2d 1124, 49 St. Rep. 611 (1992).

46-21-105. Amendment of petition — waiver of grounds for relief.

Commission Comments

Uniform State Law — Note on Commission Comments: The following states have enacted the Uniform Post-Conviction Procedure Act: Arkansas, Idaho, Iowa, Maryland, Minnesota, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, and South Dakota.

The commission comments summarize the Uniform Commission Comments and distinguish Montana changes to the U.P.C.A., thus the Uniform Commission Comments are not set forth.

The object of this section is to eliminate the unnecessary burden placed upon the courts by repetitious or specious petitions. It is highly desirable that a petitioner be required to assert all his claims in one petition. Unless good cause is shown why he did not assert all his claims in the original petition, his failure to so assert them constitutes a waiver. The way is left open, however, for a subsequent petition if the court finds grounds for relief that could not reasonably have been raised in the original petition.

Compiler's Comments

1997 Amendments — Coordination: Chapter 302 in (2), near beginning of first sentence, inserted "the opportunity for", near middle inserted "were or", and at end substituted "considered, or decided in a proceeding brought under this chapter" for "in the original or amended petition"; and inserted (3) stating what grounds for relief include for purposes of this section. Amendment effective April 17, 1997.

Chapter 378 in (1)(a), in first and third sentences after "amended", inserted "original"; in (1)(b), at beginning, substituted "The court shall dismiss a second or subsequent petition by a person who has filed an original petition unless the second or subsequent petition raises" for "Those grounds for relief not raised in the original or amended petition are waived unless the court on hearing a subsequent petition finds" and near end, after "amended", inserted "original"; in (2) inserted second sentence disallowing ineffectiveness or incompetence of counsel as an issue that can be raised in a second or subsequent petition; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1997.

Pursuant to sec. 4, Ch. 302, L. 1997, a coordination section, the amendments to the first sentence of (2) made by sec. 5, Ch. 378, L. 1997, were rendered void.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 302, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, it is the public policy of the State of Montana to provide persons accused of crimes with a fair and speedy trial and direct appellate review of legal issues fairly presented to the trial court; and

WHEREAS, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is preserved by Article II, section 19, of the Montana Constitution; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has set forth in Title 46, chapter 21, MCA, procedures for protecting an offender's right to postconviction review of the judgment; and

WHEREAS, there is no federal constitutional right to a specific statutorily prescribed postconviction procedure; and

WHEREAS, it is the Legislature's intent that decisions of Montana juries and judgments of Montana trial courts in criminal cases, including death penalty cases, be respected and given finality by other reviewing courts unless errors affecting an offender's substantial rights have occurred; and

WHEREAS, amendments to Montana's postconviction relief and death penalty statutes will further the goal of finality by codifying certain interpretations of those statutes by the Montana Supreme Court and clarifying legislative intent with respect to other provisions.

THEREFORE, it is the policy of the State of Montana to prescribe and limit, consistent with constitutional safeguards of the criminal justice process, the authority of an appellate or other reviewing court to consider legal and factual issues determined by the trial or sentencing court."

Severability: Section 5, Ch. 302, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Section 8, Ch. 378, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 9(1), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "Except as provided in subsection (2), [sections 3 through 6] [amending 46-21-101, 46-21-102, 46-21-105, and 46-21-201] apply to proceedings in which the conviction becomes final:

(a) after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]; or

(b) during the 12 months prior to the [effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997] if a petition under Title 46, chapter 21, is filed within the 12 months after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 96 in (1) inserted second sentence allowing original petition to be amended only once, inserted third sentence concerning the court deadline for the filing of the amended petition, inserted fourth sentence requiring deadline to be reasonably in advance of the hearing, and in last sentence, after "raised", inserted "in the original or amended petition".

1991 Amendment: In (1), in first sentence, substituted "46-21-101" for "this chapter"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Deleted “other than constitutional grounds” following “Any grounds” in the second sentence; added the last sentence referring to direct appeal grounds.

GENERALLY

Issues Raised for First Time On Appeal Barred: When a petitioner’s motions and briefs at the trial court level failed to challenge the legality of his sentence based on ambiguous terms, the petitioner was barred as a matter of procedure from raising the issue on appeal. Fletcher v. St., 2013 MT 266, 372 Mont. 22, 309 P.3d 998.

Death of Attorney Prior to Filing Response to Petition for Postconviction Relief — Unique Circumstance Warranting Evidentiary Hearing: Heath filed a timely petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court ordered the attorney to respond to the charges, but before a response was filed, the attorney died. Heath then requested an evidentiary hearing, but the request for a hearing was denied on grounds that the court failed to see the benefit of a hearing without the attorney in attendance, and the petition was denied without holding a hearing. Heath appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Although not all circumstances require the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing on a petition for postconviction relief, a hearing may be appropriate in certain settings with unique circumstances. The attorney’s death prior to filing a court-ordered response constituted one of those unique circumstances. The record failed to set forth the attorney’s reasons for pretrial and trial actions, and denial of a hearing left Heath without any alternative means of inquiry into the attorney’s actions and whether those decisions supported Heath’s ineffective assistance claims. Therefore, under these unique circumstances the Supreme Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing to provide Heath a reasonable alternative means to inquire into the attorney’s reasons for the pretrial and trial actions and to allow the District Court to evaluate Heath’s claims. Heath v. St., 2009 MT 7, 348 M 361, 202 P3d 118 (2009). See also Williams v. St., 2002 MT 189, 311 M 108, 53 P3d 864 (2002), and Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Failure to Show Defense Counsel’s Allegedly Deficient Performance Caused Sufficient Prejudice to Undermine Confidence in Jury’s Verdict: The District Court’s denial of a postconviction relief petition was affirmed when neither defense counsel’s failure to object to the judge’s comment on a defense witness’s qualifications nor defense counsel’s failure to object after the witness’s disqualification as an expert amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. Hammer v. St., 2008 MT 342, 346 M 279, 194 P3d 699, (2008).

No Evidence of Prejudicial State Involvement in Parole Proceedings — Postconviction Petition Properly Denied: As part of a plea agreement, the state agreed to not involve itself in Maldonado’s parole proceedings. Maldonado contended that the state breached the plea agreement when the County Attorney sent a letter to the Board of Pardons and Parole recommending against Maldonado’s parole. The District Court concluded that the state’s action was harmless, and on appeal the Supreme Court agreed. Although the Board did receive the County Attorney’s letter and one Board member met with a Deputy County Attorney, the state withdrew the letter of opposition, and the Board member who met with the Deputy County Attorney recused herself. Maldonado failed to present any evidence that the state’s actions figured into the decision of the Board of Pardons and Parole or that Maldonado was prejudiced in any way, and the District Court did not err in denying Maldonado’s request for postconviction relief on this issue. Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P3d 1043 (2008).

Issue With Trial Court Evidentiary Ruling to Be Raised on Direct Appeal: Alleged errors committed by a District Court during trial that ostensibly affect the outcome of a case, including a trial court’s allegedly erroneous evidentiary ruling regarding the admission of evidence of other crimes or acts, must be raised on direct appeal rather than through a postconviction relief proceeding. Adgeron v. St., 2007 MT 336, 340 M 242, 174 P3d 475 (2007).

No Record as to Why Counsel Took Particular Actions in Providing Defense — Effective Assistance Claim Not Appropriate for Direct Appeal: Hamilton claimed that he received ineffective assistance of counsel at a trial on incest charges, asserting that counsel: (1) failed to deliver on the promise that Hamilton would testify; (2) allowed a detective to testify regarding the veracity of Hamilton and the alleged victim; and (3) demeaned Hamilton and defense counsel in closing statements. The Supreme Court examined each claim but was unable to determine from the record why counsel took that particular strategy. Because the claims were not record-based, the effective assistance issue was not appropriate for direct appeal, and Hamilton's claim was dismissed without prejudice to raising the claim in postconviction relief proceedings. St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P3d 906 (2007), following St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001). See also St. v. Rodriguez, 2021 MT 65, 403 Mont. 360, 483 P.3d 1080.

Petition for Postconviction Relief Alleging Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Filed in District Court — Immunity of Attorney Assisting in Proceedings — Gillham Clarified: At the time of the decision in In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100 (1985), petitions for postconviction relief were addressed to the Supreme Court. Because the postconviction procedure has changed, pursuant to this section, petitions for postconviction relief are now initially filed in District Court. Thus, the Supreme Court clarified that petitions for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel may now be filed in the District Court where the postconviction proceeding is pending. The court affirmed that an attorney ordered to respond to a Gillham order issued by a District Court is not subject to a disciplinary proceeding before the Commission on Practice or subject to charges of malpractice. The immunity extends to all information, testimony, or documents necessarily provided in response to the allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel. Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007).

Section Procedural Bar — Foreclosure of Federal Habeas: This section is a state procedural bar that, under the federal procedural default doctrine, bars a federal habeas action. The section was clear, consistently applied, and well established at the time of the petitioner's purported default in raising grounds for relief on direct appeal that could have raised at that time. Hanson v. Mahoney, 433 F3d 1107 (9th Cir. 2006).

Failure to Raise Ineffective Assistance of Appellate Counsel in Petition for Postconviction Relief — Petition Barred: In a petition for postconviction relief, Swan claimed ineffective assistance of trial counsel. The District Court determined that the petition was barred under this section. On appeal, Swan claimed that under Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), unpreserved appellate issues could be raised in the context of a postconviction relief petition that alleges ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed. In Hagen, the petitioner set forth an ineffective assistance claim related to appellate counsel, not trial counsel. Swan's argument was without merit, and the petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006).

Right to Substitute Judge Not Considered Structural Issue of Constitutional Dimension — No Ineffective Assistance of Trial Counsel for Failure to Move for Automatic Substitution of Trial Judge: In a petition for postconviction relief, Swan contended that trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to move for an automatic substitution of the trial judge and that this structural error entitled Swan to a new trial. However, structural error is typically of constitutional dimensions, precedes the trial, and undermines the fairness of the entire trial proceeding. Although lack of an impartial judge would be considered a structural error, failure to exercise the statutory right to substitute a trial judge is not of constitutional dimension and is not presumed prejudicial. Having failed to establish that counsel's failure to timely move for an automatic substitution of the trial judge was an error of constitutional dimension, Swan's postconviction argument failed. Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006), following St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001).

Claim That Prior Convictions Could Not Serve as Basis for Charging Current Crime as Felony Considered Nonjurisdictional — Guilty Plea as Waiver of Nonjurisdictional Claims — Postconviction Relief Denied for Failure to Raise Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal: Slavin was convicted of partner or family member assault in 1992 and 1993. In 2001, Slavin pleaded guilty to a third charge of the same crime, which was considered a felony because of the two prior convictions, and was sentenced. Slavin did not appeal, but later filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief on grounds that the two prior convictions were constitutionally infirm. The District Court denied the petition because Slavin failed to provide direct evidence overcoming the presumption of regularity attached to the prior convictions. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that Slavin's claim was a nonjurisdictional claim involving whether the District Court had statutory authority to impose the sentence, not whether the court had the power or capacity to impose the sentence. Slavin's knowing and voluntary guilty plea constituted a waiver of all nonjurisdictional defects and defenses that arose prior to the plea. Additionally, because Slavin failed to appeal the legality of the sentence, postconviction consideration of the sentence-related claim was precluded. The District Court was affirmed. Slavin v. St., 2005 MT 306, 329 M 424, 127 P3d 350 (2005), following Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2005), and overruling St. v. LaPier, 1998 MT 174, 289 M 392, 961 P2d 1274 (1998).

Record Devoid of Reasons for Counsel's Conduct During Voir Dire — Ineffective Assistance Claim Improperly Raised on Direct Appeal: Defendant's claims of ineffective assistance of counsel during voir dire could not be addressed without considering matters outside the record and were therefore inappropriate for direct appeal. The claims were thus dismissed without prejudice to defendant's pursuit of the claims in postconviction proceedings. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), following St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003).

Counsel Decision to Forego Certain Defense Considered Trial Strategy — Insufficient Record to Determine Effective Assistance of Counsel on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Hendricks contended that he was provided ineffective assistance of counsel in his assault trial because his attorney failed to raise the affirmative defense of justifiable use of force. However, in a disclosure statement filed prior to the omnibus hearing, Hendricks's counsel specifically noted that the defense of justifiable use of force would not be asserted. On the morning of trial, counsel stated that no jury instructions on the defense of justifiable use of force would be offered. Thus, the decision not to raise the defense was made consciously and was not the result of ignorance or neglect and was presumed to be sound trial strategy falling within the realm of reasonable professional conduct absent evidence to the contrary. Absent a sufficient record to address the issue of ineffective assistance, the direct appeal was dismissed, requiring Hendricks to raise the issue by a postconviction relief proceeding, if at all. The Supreme Court clarified that it will no longer use the approach in St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), to determine effective assistance of counsel, but rather the procedure set out in St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003). St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 223, 317 M 177, 75 P3d 1268 (2003), followed in St. v. Webster, 2005 MT 38, 326 M 112, 107 P3d 500 (2005), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

One-Year Limitation on All Postconviction Proceedings, Including Second or Subsequent Petitions — Exception: Defendant contended that the 1-year period of limitation in 46-21-102 applies only to an initial or original petition for postconviction relief, not to a second or subsequent petition. The Supreme Court disagreed. The 1-year period of limitation applies to the initiation of all postconviction proceedings, including those initiated by a second or subsequent petition. Further, under this section, in order to avoid dismissal, a second or subsequent petition must also demonstrate good cause why its claims were not asserted in the original petition. A narrow exception to the 1-year limitation period is allowed under 46-21-102(2), which provides that a petition that alleges newly discovered evidence may be filed 1 year after the evidence was discovered or reasonably should have been discovered. St. v. Root, 2003 MT 28, 314 M 186, 64 P3d 1035 (2003).

Failure of District Court to Review Entire Record on Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Violative of Due Process When Same Judge Presided at Trial: When considering Hagen's petition for postconviction relief, the District Court did not review the entire trial proceedings before making its conclusions of law. Hagen contended that failure to review the entire record deprived him of due process and resulted in erroneous findings and conclusions. A fundamental requirement of due process is the opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner; however, due process is a flexible concept that calls for such procedural protections as a particular situation demands. There is nothing in the postconviction relief statutes that explicitly requires that a District Court review the entire record, and the Supreme Court declined to impose a duty on District Courts to review the entire record in every situation. Rather, the scope of the duty is determined on a case-by-case basis. In this case, the District Court Judge who presided over the postconviction hearing was the same judge who presided at trial, so the duty to review relevant portions of the record at issue in the postconviction proceedings did not extend to the entire record because the same judge heard the trial testimony when it was presented. St. v. Hagen, 2002 MT 190, 311 M 117, 53 P3d 885 (2002).

Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Failure to Appeal Sentence and Withholding Exculpatory Evidence — No Showing of Deficient Performance of Counsel: Wright contended in a petition for postconviction relief that he received ineffective assistance of counsel when his attorney failed to appeal the sentence after indicating to Wright that the sentence would be appealed and when counsel withheld exculpatory evidence from Wright prior to a change of plea hearing. Wright contended that counsel failed to mention that two of Wright's sexual assault victims made second statements that contradicted their original statements, which would have cleared Wright of 2 of the 11 charges against him. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test for ineffective assistance, which required Wright to first show that counsel's performance was deficient. By deposition, counsel in this case swore that he was never asked to appeal, and never indicated to Wright that the sentence would be appealed. The only evidence suggesting counsel's refusal to appeal was Wright's own affidavit. The District Court accepted counsel's statements, and that decision was not disturbed by the Supreme Court absent a showing of clear error. Further, the only support for Wright's contention that counsel withheld exculpatory evidence was Wright's own affidavit. Wright failed to produce the alleged revised statements or any records indicating that the victims even gave second statements; thus, Wright's affidavit was no more than a mere conclusory allegation unsupported by any evidence. The Supreme Court held that Wright failed to show that counsel's performance was deficient and declined to grant postconviction relief on the issue. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), followed in Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004).

Record Indicating Voluntary Nature of Guilty Plea — Postconviction Relief Barred When Ineffective Counsel Claim Could Have Been Raised on Direct Appeal: At a change of plea hearing, Wright pleaded guilty to 11 counts of sexual assault and was sentenced to 55 years in prison. The District Court suspended sentence on six counts. Wright did not file a direct appeal on any issue, but more than 1 year after sentencing, he filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, asserting that he was coerced into pleading guilty by his attorney. On the issue of the voluntariness of the guilty pleas, the Supreme Court looked to the record to determine whether this question of fact was documented in the District Court. In this case, there was ample indication in the record to determine that the issue of the voluntary nature of Wright's pleas and the propriety of counsel's representation were raised in District Court and documented. Wright could thus have raised the issue on direct appeal, but failing to do so, he was barred from raising the issue in a petition for postconviction relief pursuant to this section. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Failure of Trial Counsel to Request Ruling on Use of Suppressed Confession for Impeachment Purposes — Absence in Record of Understanding of Counsel's Course of Action — Remand for Determination of Reasonableness of Counsel's Actions: Harris claimed ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney at trial never requested a ruling from the trial court on the prosecution's use of Harris's suppressed confession for impeachment purposes. The trial court's deferral of the ruling initially preserved the issue for appeal should the prosecution have referred to the confession at trial, but Harris's counsel decided to raise the issue of the suppressed confession on direct examination, which created an opening for the prosecution to further question Harris on cross-examination and made the appealable issue moot. The record did not reveal whether counsel's acts and omissions sprang from tactical decisions based on articulable trial strategies or reflected misunderstandings of the law and trial procedures. Because information outside the record was necessary to determine the merits of Harris's assistance of counsel claim, this section did not bar a postconviction assertion of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial (see St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001)). The Supreme Court refused to speculate on whether the alleged errors reflected a coherent trial strategy or whether they were reasonable and deserved deference, so the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing to determine whether counsel's actions fell below an objective standard of reasonableness pursuant to the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001), followed in St. v. Worthan, 2006 MT 147, 332 M 401, 138 P3d 805 (2006).

Inability to Document Claim of Ineffective Counsel From Record — Dismissal of Petition for Postconviction Relief Improper: Following conviction on numerous felony charges, Whitlow appealed his conviction and sentence, but did not raise concerns about ineffective assistance of counsel in the appeal. The conviction and sentence were upheld by the Montana Supreme Court, and Whitlow subsequently petitioned for postconviction relief, claiming that he was denied the right to effective assistance of counsel when his trial counsel failed to ask followup questions during voir dire. The District Court held that Whitlow's petition was barred under subsection (2) of this section because the claim of ineffective assistance should have been raised on direct appeal and that Whitlow's sole claim of ineffective assistance was to be found within the trial record. As set out in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), when ineffective assistance of counsel claims are based on facts of record in the underlying case, they must be raised on direct appeal, but when those claims cannot be documented from the record, they must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. The state insisted that St. v. Chastain, 285 M 61, 947 P2d 57 (1997), established that ineffective assistance claims, such as Whitlow's, can reasonably be raised on direct appeal and that in order to conclude that Whitlow's ineffective assistance claim was not record-based, Chastain must be overruled. The Supreme Court disagreed, distinguishing Chastain instead. In contrast to the jurors' clear expressions for potential bias in Chastain, in Whitlow's case, the jurors all indicated that they could reserve judgment until the facts had been presented. It was possible that Whitlow's counsel could have known other facts that would lead to the reasonable belief that, despite their possible prejudices, placing those jurors on the panel would be favorable to Whitlow. As stated in U.S. v. Taglia, 922 F2d 413 (7th Cir. 1991), when the only record on which a claim of ineffective assistance is based is the trial record, every indulgence will be given to the possibility that a seeming lapse or error by defense counsel was in fact a tactical move, flawed only in hindsight. Thus, in order to establish that his counsel's decision not to question or challenge the prospective jurors was not the product of sound trial strategy, Whitlow would have to go beyond the trial record. Because the ineffective assistance claims could not be documented from the record, they could not have been raised on direct appeal. The District Court erred in dismissing the petition for postconviction relief based on the bar in subsection (2) of this section. Without commenting on the merits of Whitlow's claim, the Supreme Court reversed. St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Both Procedurally and Time Barred: Wells pleaded guilty to felony assault, and the District Court entered its written judgment and sentence on January 2, 1998. Wells did not appeal, and the time for filing an appeal expired 60 days later, on March 3, 1998, which became the date of final conviction. In order to come within the 1-year period for a petition for postconviction relief, Wells needed to file by March 3, 1999, but the petition was not filed until December 22, 1999, when Wells asserted a double jeopardy claim for weapons enhancement based on St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999). The District Court dismissed the petition as untimely. Wells argued on appeal that the 1-year limitation is not a jurisdictional limitation, but rather a statute of limitations subject to equitable tolling, and contended that a tolling should be applied to the time period that Wells was incarcerated in New Mexico without adequate legal assistance. The Supreme Court recalled the holding in St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313 (2000), when it was held that the postconviction statute of limitations is indeed a jurisdictional limit on litigation to be waived only if there is a clear miscarriage of justice and defendant alleges newly discovered evidence that defendant did not commit the offense. Wells presented no new evidence of innocence. Further, Wells could have raised the Guillaume claim on direct appeal, but did not. Wells' petition was thus both procedurally and time-barred. St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), to the extent that Wells was barred from raising a double jeopardy claim in a petition for postconviction relief pursuant to this section for failing to raise the issue on direct appeal, and overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Wells held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Application for Sentence Review Not Considered Direct Appeal — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: Postconviction relief provides a defendant with a procedure to address claims that would have been raised by means of a petition for writ of habeas corpus or a writ of error coram nobis, while the Sentence Review Division reviews the equity of a sentence. The plain language of this section makes it clear that an application for review of a sentence, as contained in 46-18-903, is not a direct appeal within the context of this section. Further, the common-law rule of plain error does not extend to cases in which a defendant had the opportunity to challenge a dangerous offender designation on direct appeal but chose not to. St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

CLAIMS RAISED OR THAT COULD HAVE BEEN RAISED ON DIRECT APPEAL

Claim of Denial of Access to Counsel to Be Raised During Direct Appeal: The defendant's attorney was directed by jail staff to end her meeting with the defendant and leave the facility around 10:30 at night during an overnight recess. The defendant argued that requiring his attorney to leave had denied him access to counsel at a critical stage of the trial. The Supreme Court held that under the statute, when a petitioner has been afforded the opportunity for a direct appeal of the petitioner's conviction, grounds for relief that could have been raised on direct appeal may not be raised in a proceeding brought under postconviction statutes. Rose v. St., 2013 MT 161, 370 Mont. 398, 304 P.3d 387.

Claims Raised on Direct Appeal Barred in Postconviction Proceeding: In an action for postconviction relief, the petitioner argued that the District Court should have granted his motion to suppress certain statements, that he was denied a speedy trial, and that his counsel was ineffective. However, with the exception of the ineffective assistance of counsel claims, all of the petitioner's claims were barred from appellate review because they were or could have been raised on direct appeal. Rukes v. St., 2013 MT 56, 369 Mont. 215, 297 P.3d 1195.

Claim of Ineffective Assistance by Direct Appeal Inappropriate When Record Does Not Fully Explain Counsel's Action: The defendant was convicted of aggravated burglary and sexual intercourse without consent and argued on direct appeal that his counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to obtain an independent medical expert to review the records of the physical examination of the victim. However, the Supreme Court held that because the record did not fully explain why an independent medical examination was not obtained, the defendant should pursue his claim in a proceeding for postconviction relief. Longjaw v. St., 2012 MT 243, 366 Mont. 472, 288 P.3d 210. See also St. v. Ward, 2020 MT 36, 399 Mont. 16, 457 P.3d 955.

Record-Based Claims of Involuntary Plea, Breach of Plea Agreement, and Impermissibility of Polygraph Results Barred From Postconviction Consideration: In a petition for postconviction relief, Evert raised issues regarding the voluntariness of his guilty plea, an alleged breach of the plea agreement by the County Attorney, and the potential of flawed sentencing because evidence of a polygraph test was admitted and considered by the sentencing court. The Supreme Court analyzed each claim and determined that each was record-based and could have been raised on direct appeal and was therefore procedurally barred from postconviction consideration. St. v. Evert, 2007 MT 30, 336 M 36, 152 P3d 713 (2007).

No Challenge to Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Relief Barred: Hardin claimed in a petition for postconviction relief that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to accept a nolo contendere plea to a sexual offense because such a plea is prohibited under 46-12-204. The petition was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Hardin failed to challenge the legality of the sentence on direct appeal, so the claim was procedurally barred by this section from postconviction relief. Hardin v. St., 2006 MT 272, 334 M 204, 146 P3d 746 (2006), overruled in part in Gardipee v. Salmonsens, 2021 MT 115, 404 Mont. 144, 486 P.3d 689, to the extent that Hardin fails to distinguish between an illegal sentence and an invalid plea.

Failure to Raise Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Consideration Barred: Osborne was convicted of a fourth DUI in 1999, and when charged with felony DUI in 2003, the state sought to have Osborne declared a persistent felony offender. The District Court obliged, and Osborne was declared a persistent felony offender and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 5 years suspended. Osborne did not appeal the sentence directly, but filed a petition for postconviction relief, asserting that the sentence was not legal. The petition was denied, and Osborne appealed. The state argued that the Supreme Court was procedurally barred under this section from considering the petition because the legal challenge to the sentence could have been raised on direct appeal. Osborne asserted that because the state did not raise the procedural bar issue in District Court, that argument was waived. Although the Supreme Court as a rule does not consider issues raised for the first time on appeal, this general rule does not preclude consideration of jurisdictional questions raised for the first time on appeal. The procedural bar is jurisdictional, so the court considered the state's argument, concluding that lack of subject matter jurisdiction may not be waived and that this section represents a jurisdictional limit on courts' ability to entertain and decide petitions for postconviction relief and effectively prohibits courts from exercising jurisdiction over grounds for relief that could have been raised on direct appeal. Thus, Osborne's failure to challenge the legality of the sentence on direct appeal precluded consideration in a postconviction petition. St. v. Osborne, 2005 MT 264, 329 M 95, 124 P3d 1085 (2005).

Claim of Illegal Sentence Based on Lack of Jurisdiction to Be Raised on Direct Appeal, Not Postconviction Petition — Pena Applied: Camarillo was a minor when he was convicted in 1999 of deliberate homicide, robbery, and aggravated burglary and sentenced as an adult offender to 70 years in the state prison. The case was filed directly in District Court rather than Youth Court, as allowed under 41-5-206. Camarillo filed a petition for postconviction relief in 2003, claiming that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The state responded that the claims could have been raised on direct appeal, and the District Court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the District Court properly exercised jurisdiction under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., so Camarillo's jurisdiction argument failed. The court then applied Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and held that the issues that Camarillo attempted to raise in the petition for postconviction relief could have been but were not raised on direct appeal and, pursuant to this section, could not be brought in the petition for postconviction relief. In addition, under 46-21-102, petitions for postconviction relief must be filed within 1 year of final judgment. Camarillo's petition was not filed until more than 3 years after judgment and thus was untimely. The District Court was affirmed. Camarillo v. St., 2005 MT 29, 326 M 35, 107 P3d 1265 (2005).

Untimely Hearing on Alleged Probation Violation — Not Considered in Postconviction Relief Proceeding When It Could Have Been Raised on Direct Appeal: Appellant's claim that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to revoke a suspended sentence following his arrest for another offense because he was not given a probation revocation hearing within 72 hours of his detention, as required by 46-23-1012, did not raise a true jurisdictional question. The claim was more properly characterized as a claim that his sentence was illegal, which was a nonjurisdictional claim for purposes of postconviction relief statutes. This section precludes postconviction relief on such a claim because appellant could have raised the claim on direct appeal. Sanders v. St., 2004 MT 374, 325 M 59, 103 P3d 1053 (2004).

Sentence Under Plea Bargain Within Statutory Maximum Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment — Cruel and Unusual Punishment Claim Not Raised on Direct Appeal Barred in Postconviction Proceedings: In exchange for dismissal of a charge of assault with a bodily fluid, Basto entered a plea agreement to plead guilty of possession of a deadly weapon by a prisoner. Basto was sentenced to 5 years in prison and subsequently filed a timely petition for postconviction relief on grounds that the sentence was disproportionately severe when compared to the sentences of other defendants in the case, constituting cruel and unusual punishment. The state responded that there is no guarantee of proportionality under the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment and that even if there were, Basto's sentence was still within statutory parameters. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. A sentence that is within maximum statutory guidelines does not violate the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Basto received the sentence that he bargained for, and there was nothing in the plea agreement that indicated that Basto would receive the same sentence as the other defendants. Further, Basto failed to raise any cruel and unusual punishment argument on direct appeal, so the argument was barred in postconviction proceedings under this section. Basto v. St., 2004 MT 257, 323 M 80, 97 P3d 1113 (2004). See also St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202 (1995), and St. v. Mingus, 2004 MT 24, 319 M 349, 84 P3d 658 (2004).

Issues Subsumed in First Appeal Res Judicata on Second Appeal: In a noncite opinion (St. v. Kallowat, 2000 MT 354N), the Supreme Court affirmed defendant's Sanders County convictions for felony DUI, driving with a suspended or revoked license, and felony bail-jumping. Kallowat's petition for postconviction relief was denied, and Kallowat appealed. The issue decided in the first appeal was whether the arresting officer had probable cause, given that the officer was a prior felon. The Supreme Court held that even if the officer's employment status was questionable, he still had probable cause to make the arrest as a private citizen. Kallowat devoted most of the motion for postconviction relief reiterating the same arguments, and because the postconviction arguments were subsumed in the issues considered in the first appeal, the issue was res judicata and the Supreme Court declined further consideration. Kallowat v. St., 2004 MT 152, 321 M 501, 92 P3d 1176 (2004).

Failure to Raise Question of District Court's Sentencing Authority on Direct Appeal — Issue Precluded in Postconviction Hearing: In a petition for postconviction relief, Thurston alleged that the District Court erred by imposing a prison sentence without considering the statutory nonviolent offender criteria. The claim was denied by the District Court on grounds that the issue should have been raised on direct appeal. The Supreme Court affirmed. Contrary to Thurston's contention, the issue was not a subject matter jurisdiction issue that could be raised at any time. The failure to consider nonviolent offender sentencing alternatives should have been raised on direct appeal, and failure to do so precluded consideration of the issue in postconviction proceedings. Thurston v. St., 2004 MT 142, 321 M 411, 91 P3d 1259 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145 (1996).

Failure to Provide Proof of Entitlement to Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied: Ellenburg raised several issues on appeal, some of which were raised in District Court and some of which were not. The Supreme Court declined to address all issues that were not preserved for appeal. Several other issues were procedurally barred because Ellenburg either raised them on direct appeal or reasonably could have raised them on direct appeal. Postconviction relief was denied on the remaining issues because Ellenburg waived the right to appeal those issues by failing to provide any evidentiary support for the allegations. The petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), following St. v. Schmalz, 1998 MT 210, 290 M 420, 964 P2d 763 (1998), St. v. Niederklopper, 2000 MT 187, 300 M 397, 6 P3d 448 (2000), and St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), and followed in Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Failure of Counsel to Properly Withdraw or Preserve Direct Appeal — Denial of Postconviction Petition Erroneous: Adams filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel because his original court-appointed attorney failed to move to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial and because his subsequently appointed trial counsel offered a lesser included instruction on aggravated assault to the jury and failed to appeal to the Supreme Court following Adams' conviction, despite Adams' request to do so. The petition was denied on grounds that Adams failed to file an appeal within 60 days of judgment as required by former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and Adams appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Under 46-8-103, appointed counsel is required to continue representation until final judgment, including appellate review, unless counsel is relieved by court order. Adams' counsel failed to comply with the requirements of 46-8-103 and effect a valid withdrawal, so the right to appeal was not preserved. When a defendant would have appealed but for counsel's deficient performance, the error is prejudicial. Thus, denial of Adams' petition for postconviction relief on procedural grounds was reversible error, and on remand, Adams was allowed to raise the issues that would have been raised on direct appeal but for counsel's abandonment of the appeal, as well as the issues raised in the petition for postconviction relief that were not previously raised. St. v. Adams, 2002 MT 202, 311 M 202, 54 P3d 50 (2002), following In re Petition of Hans, 1998 MT 7, 288 M 168, 958 P2d 1175 (1998), and St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Postconviction Relief Barred Upon Failure to Raise Issue of Alleged Unlawful Sentences on Direct Appeal: In a petition for postconviction relief, Wright alleged three erroneous sentencing issues: (1) oral pronouncement of the sentence varied from the written sentence; (2) the District Court's nunc pro tunc order was improper; and (3) a sentencing condition ordering Wright to stay out of Custer County was illegal. However, Wright could have reasonably raised the sentencing issues before the District Court and on direct appeal, but chose not to do so. Thus, Wright was procedurally barred under subsection (2) of this section from raising the issues in postconviction relief. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Claims Raised on Direct Appeal Barred by Statute or Res Judicata on Petition for Postconviction Relief: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were summarily dismissed. Although res judicata prevents claims raised on appeal from being raised again in a petition for postconviction relief, Dawson argued that three of his claims for postconviction relief could not have been raised on direct appeal because they required evidence not found in the record and thus should not have been subject to summary judgment. The District Court concluded that the issues could have been raised on direct appeal and were not preserved through objection at trial and so were barred by res judicata and this section. The Supreme Court examined all three of Dawson's claims before affirming that this section was properly applied to two of the claims and that no prejudice resulted from the application of res judicata to the third. Lastly, Dawson raised Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182 (1996), as grounds for reconsideration of several other claims based on serving the "ends of justice". The Supreme Court felt no compulsion to reconsider any of Dawson's claims to serve those ends because the claims were barred by res judicata. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

Authority to Defer Imposition of Sentence When Financial Condition Imposed — Failure to File Timely Appeal: Ingersoll filed for postconviction relief, arguing that the District Court lacked statutory authority to either impose consecutive deferred sentences or to defer imposition of his sentence in excess of 3 years. The Supreme Court found that the District Court had statutory authority at the time of sentencing under 46-18-201 to impose a deferred sentence for up to 6 years for Ingersoll's felony conviction for criminal mischief. Therefore, pursuant to former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), Ingersoll had 60 days after sentencing to appeal the court's authority to impose the sentence. Failure to file a timely appeal rendered Ingersoll's claim procedurally barred in a postconviction hearing. Ingersoll v. St., 1999 MT 215, 295 M 520, 986 P2d 403, 56 St. Rep. 843 (1999).

Failure to Raise Claims on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Relief Unavailable: In his petition for postconviction relief, Gollehon requested that the Supreme Court reconsider its rulings on certain issues that were decided on direct appeal. The court declined to address the issues again. Postconviction relief is not available on claims that a petitioner could have raised on direct appeal. Here, if Gollehon failed to adequately raise issues in his direct appeal, he was procedurally barred from doing so under a petition for postconviction relief. If the issues were adequately raised, relitigation of the issues was barred by res judicata. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999).

Issue of Whether Postconviction Claims Barred Raised Sua Sponte — Statutory Bar Not Primary Basis for Denial of Postconviction Relief: Wilson asserted that the District Court should not have raised sua sponte the issue of whether Wilson's postconviction claims were barred because of his failure to directly appeal a sentencing order to the Supreme Court. Although the District Court did suggest that the procedural bar in this section could be applied to Wilson's claims, the court fully discussed those claims on their merits. Therefore, the procedural bar was not the primary or alternative basis for denial of Wilson's postconviction relief and the court did not err. St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Petition for Postconviction Relief — Only Record-Based Claims Barred by Statute or Res Judicata: In 1993, Hagen was convicted of deliberate homicide and aggravated assault and appealed to the Montana Supreme Court, raising the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court. Hagen then filed a petition for postconviction relief, raising nine claims of ineffective assistance of counsel and argued that: (1) none of the claims could have been raised in his earlier direct appeal; (2) all claims were appropriate for his petition because an evidentiary hearing was required for all nine issues; (3) appellate counsel was ineffective in raising a particular issue in his previous direct appeal; and (4) if some or all of the claims relating to ineffective assistance of trial counsel should have been raised in his direct appeal but were not and were therefore barred, his appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance in failing to present those issues in his direct appeal. The state responded that six of Hagen's claims were procedurally barred by this section because they could have been raised in his previous appeal, that one claim was barred by res judicata because it had been raised and decided in his previous appeal, and that three of Hagen's claims were not supported by the record or by the law and could therefore be decided on their merits without an evidentiary hearing. The District Court refused Hagen's request for an evidentiary hearing on his petition for postconviction relief and dismissed the petition, holding that the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel was raised in Hagen's direct appeal and had been decided by the Supreme Court, that Hagen's adequate remedy of appeal had been pursued, and that the petition for postconviction relief failed to state a claim for relief. Hagen appealed the dismissal of the petition to the Supreme Court. As an initial observation, the Supreme Court pointed out that although all of the issues raised by Hagen in his appeal of the District Court's denial of his petition for postconviction relief concerned ineffective assistance of counsel, not all of those claims were raised in the previous direct appeal and only those claims that were raised or that could have been raised in that previous direct appeal based upon the trial record were barred by the doctrine of res judicata or subsection (2) of this section. Citing In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156 (1991), and St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611 (1995), the Supreme Court further pointed out that those issues that are not record-based are properly brought to the Supreme Court by a petition for postconviction relief and that the District Court erred in failing to make that distinction and dismissing all of Hagen's ineffective assistance claims just because some of those claims may have been legitimately barred. The Supreme Court then individually reviewed each of Hagen's ineffective assistance claims and held that: (1) the manner in which mental evaluations of Hagen were disseminated during the trial was a matter of record and was therefore barred; (2) failure of Hagen's trial counsel to object to evidence introduced at trial was a matter of record and was therefore barred; (3) eliciting certain cross-examination testimony was based upon record evidence and was barred; (4) shifting the burden of proof during counsel's closing argument was a matter of record and barred by res judicata and this section; (5) failure to investigate facts that could have provided a defense was properly raised in the postconviction relief petition because there could be no record evidence on this issue; (6) failure of trial counsel to present impeachment testimony was in part resolved during the appeal and was therefore res judicata and, with regard to one potential witness, was a matter of failure of trial counsel to investigate, could not be a matter of record, and therefore was not barred; (7) failure of trial counsel to properly prepare witnesses for trial was not and could not be reflected in the trial record and therefore was not barred; and (8) failure of appellate counsel to raise the ineffective assistance of trial counsel could not have been a matter of record evidence by its very nature and was therefore not barred from consideration in the postconviction relief petition. Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999), distinguished in Smith v. St., 2000 MT 327, 303 M 47, 15 P3d 395, 57

St. Rep. 1387 (2000), and followed in St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), and St. v. Upshaw, 2006 MT 341, 335 M 162, 153 P3d 579 (2006). See also St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), in which the question of voluntariness of a plea because of ineffective assistance of counsel was remanded for a hearing, despite the previous disposition of other voluntariness claims on direct appeal, because discussions between defendant and counsel were not record-based and thus could be presented only through postconviction proceedings.

Failure to Raise Double Jeopardy Issue at Trial or on Direct Appeal — Petition for Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: Mothka was charged with conspiracy to sell dangerous drugs and entered a plea agreement under which he pleaded guilty, agreed to forfeiture of a majority of his business assets, and agreed not to contest any alleged violation of his constitutional rights. Following conviction and sentencing, Mothka claimed a double jeopardy violation in that he had already been punished by the civil forfeiture of his property. However, the claim could have been raised in District Court and on direct appeal but was not. Therefore, the District Court properly denied the petition as procedurally barred pursuant to this section. Mothka v. St., 281 M 175, 931 P2d 1331, 54 St. Rep. 122 (1997).

Procedural Bar Applicable to Jurisdictional Issues: The purpose of the waiver provision in subsection (2) of this section is to preserve the integrity of the trial and direct appeal and to prevent abuse of the postconviction relief process. The procedural bar rule in subsection (2) of this section does not apply in a petition for postconviction relief when the sentencing court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to impose the particular sentence. Because Moorman's claims contained in his petition for postconviction relief could have been raised on direct appeal, those claims were procedurally barred from consideration in a postconviction proceeding. St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996), following St. v. Ohnmacht, 342 NW 2d 838 (Iowa 1983), and Maxfield v. St., 700 P2d 115 (Idaho App. 1985), distinguishing St. v. Akers, 106 M 43, 74 P2d 1138 (1938), and Smith v. St., 186 M 52, 606 P2d 153 (1980), and overruled, to the extent that a sentencing issue was treated as jurisdictional, in Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004).

Issues Not Raised on Appeal Barred by Statute — Scope of Bar: Brown was convicted of felony assault (now assault with a weapon), and the conviction was affirmed on appeal. Brown then filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming ineffective assistance of his appellate counsel and that the introduction of certain evidence at trial violated his fourth and fifth amendment rights. In his petition for postconviction relief, Brown acknowledged that the constitutional issues were not raised on appeal but argued that the statutory bar should not apply because he tried to raise the issues, but neither his trial nor appellate counsels did so. Citing St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54 (1995), the Supreme Court held that because Brown's appellate counsel properly applied that law (concluding that issues not raised at trial could not be raised on appeal) and because the statutory language barring issues that "could reasonably have been raised on direct appeal" included issues not properly preserved at trial, Brown was precluded from raising those issues in a petition for postconviction relief. Brown v. St., 277 M 430, 922 P2d 1146, 53 St. Rep. 692 (1996).

Confession-Related Claims Barred on Appeal — Res Judicata: Beach raised claims regarding the voluntariness and legality of his confession. The Supreme Court compared the confession-related claims quoted in the petition for postconviction relief and found that either they were identical in substance to those raised on direct appeal or that they could have been raised on direct appeal but were not. The claims are barred by res judicata and this section because a procedural bar exists to postconviction claims that could have been raised on direct appeal. Beach v. Day, 275 M 370, 913 P2d 622, 53 St. Rep. 184 (1996).

Failure to Raise Issue of Waiver of Jury Trial on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Relief Procedurally Barred: Despite Christensen's allegation that he did not timely appeal the issue of whether he waived a jury trial because he was informed by both his attorney and the City Court Judge that an appeal could not be taken from a City Court bench trial, the District Court properly found that Christensen knew of the right to appeal but declined to do so. The procedural bar in this section serves to prevent abuses of the postconviction process and to preserve the integrity of the trial and the direct appeal process. Because Christensen could have raised the issue on direct appeal, he was statutorily barred from raising the issue in a postconviction petition. St. v. Christensen, 274 M 326, 907 P2d 970, 52 St. Rep. 1254 (1995).

Procedural Bar on Postconviction Claims That Could Have Been Raised on Appeal: As set out in Harris v. Reed, 489 US 255, 103 L Ed 2d 308, 109 S Ct 1038 (1989), the application of a state procedural bar is generally considered an independent and adequate state ground precluding federal habeas review. Further, a lack of absolute consistency in the application of a state's procedural bar is not necessarily fatal. Therefore, claims that could reasonably have been raised on appeal are procedurally barred from consideration in postconviction proceedings regardless of whether or not the failure to raise the claim was an intentional strategic decision of counsel to cause delay. In this case, those claims included denial of the right to a fair trial and to a fair and impartial jury, assertion of prosecutor misconduct, failure by the state to corroborate testimony of an accomplice witness, prejudice caused by the presence of armed officers in the courtroom during trial, failure to convict by a unanimous jury, jury instructions regarding voluntary intoxication and the inference of a criminal mental state, constitutionality of Montana's death penalty, double jeopardy, and failure by the trial court to disclose a psychological report to the prosecution. Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995), overruling St. v. Henricks, 206 M 469, 672 P2d 20 (1983), and followed in Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Barred by Waiver of Right to Appeal: Manula was arrested for rape and kidnapping and released on bond. While awaiting trial, he was arrested for rape, incest, and kidnapping. He stood trial and was convicted for the second series of crimes. As part of a plea agreement, Manula voluntarily signed a waiver of rights to not appeal his conviction in the trial for the second set of crimes and to enter an "Alford" guilty plea to the first set of crimes in return for the prosecution recommending specific sentences in both causes of action. Manula subsequently petitioned for postconviction relief on the basis of denial of his right to appeal, ineffective assistance of counsel, lack of evidence, and other claims. The Supreme Court held that a voluntary waiver of the right to appeal barred the defendant from raising other claims for postconviction relief. In re Petition of Manula, 263 M 166, 866 P2d 1127, 50 St. Rep. 1758 (1993), followed in St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299, 56 St. Rep. 891 (1999).

Reserving for Postconviction Relief — Ineffective Assistance Claim That May Be Made on Appeal: On appeal, a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel with respect to any matters in the record may not be reserved and later made in a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Postconviction Relief Barred When Allegations Appealable on Direct Appeal: The District Court properly denied defendant's petition for postconviction relief when it was determined that defendant's allegations could have been, should have been, or were raised on direct appeal and that petitioner's allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel were merely conclusory rather than based on facts in the record. Eiler v. St., 254 M 39, 833 P2d 1124, 49 St. Rep. 611 (1992), followed in St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54, 52 St. Rep. 735 (1995). St. v. Baker was followed in Brown v. St., 277 M 430, 922 P2d 1146, 53 St. Rep. 692 (1996), Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), and Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Ineffective Counsel Claims Not Raised on Direct Appeal: After his convictions for aggravated burglary, felony assault (now assault with a weapon), and felony theft, petitioner obtained new counsel and appealed his convictions to the Supreme Court. When the convictions were affirmed on appeal, petitioner filed for postconviction relief, alleging that he was denied effective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court denied the petition, ruling that because petitioner failed to raise claims concerning ineffective assistance of counsel on direct appeal, his assertions were procedurally barred. In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156, 48 St. Rep. 702 (1991), followed in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Allegation of Newly Discovered Evidence — Failure to Timely Appeal — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: The Supreme Court denied a petition for writ of habeas corpus based on allegations of newly discovered medical evidence, noting that there was no showing as to what constituted the new evidence and that petitioner was afforded the right of appeal but did not take it. Tecca v. McCormick, 246 M 317, 806 P2d 11, 47 St. Rep. 2068 (1990), followed in Blaney v. Gamble, 266 M 51, 879 P2d 51, 51 St. Rep. 466 (1994). Tecca was distinguished in Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Raising Issue in Postconviction Relief That Could Have Been Preserved for Appeal — Abuse of Process: Defendant sought to challenge jury instructions in a petition for postconviction relief after failing to object to the disputed instructions at trial. He offered no excuse for failing to object and did not argue that he could not have reasonably complied with the procedural requirements of 46-16-401 and 46-20-104. Because objections to the instructions could have been raised at trial, those grounds for relief could have reasonably been available for direct appeal. To allow defendant to raise an issue in postconviction relief that he could reasonably have preserved for direct appeal would constitute an abuse of process. St. v. Gorder, 243 M 333, 792 P2d 370, 47 St. Rep. 958 (1990), followed in St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54, 52 St. Rep. 735 (1995). Baker was followed in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Evidentiary Issues Not Raised on Direct Appeal: The defendant refused to cooperate with his appointed appellate attorney. The attorney was relieved, and the defendant was ordered to proceed pro se and was given an extension of time to file his appellate brief. Two weeks after the time period expired, the Supreme Court dismissed his appeal. The defendant then filed a petition for postconviction relief that included claims of failure to suppress evidence and the presentation of false testimony by the state. The Supreme Court ruled that the defendant was procedurally barred from raising issues in a petition for postconviction relief that could have been raised on direct appeal. Duncan v. St., 243 M 232, 794 P2d 331, 47 St. Rep. 738 (1990), followed in St. v. McColley, 247 M 524, 807 P2d 1358, 48 St. Rep. 290 (1991), and St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54, 52 St. Rep. 735 (1995). Baker was followed in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Judicial and Prosecutorial Misconduct Not Raised on Direct Appeal: The defendant argued that several comments made at trial by the judge and prosecuting attorney amounted to misconduct. The Supreme Court referred to the direct language of the statute and held that the argument of prosecutorial and judicial misconduct was not raised on direct appeal and therefore was procedurally barred on petition. In re Petition of Martin, 240 M 419, 787 P2d 746, 46 St. Rep. 2213 (1989).

CLAIMS ALLOWED IN POSTCONVICTION RELIEF PROCEEDING

No Challenge to Conviction in Petition for Postconviction Relief — Court May Not Accept Plea of Nolo Contendere for Sexual Offenses: A claim that a plea is invalid constitutes a claim challenging a conviction and may not be made in a petition for postconviction relief. Gardipee v. Salmonsens, 2021 MT 115, 404 Mont. 144, 486 P.3d 689.

Ineffective Counsel Claim Dismissed Without Prejudice — Postconviction Relief Proceeding Appropriate to Develop Record: The defendant was convicted of failure to give notice of change of address by a sexual offender. During voir dire, a potential juror said that he was suspicious of a defendant who would not testify. The defendant's attorney did not question the potential witness further, passed the jury panel for cause, then exercised a peremptory challenge for the juror. On appeal, the defendant argued that his attorney was ineffective for not further questioning or challenging the potential juror for cause rather than using a peremptory challenge. The Supreme Court dismissed the argument without prejudice, holding that without the benefit of a postconviction relief proceeding, the record was not clear as to whether the representation was deficient. St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Defendant's Failure to Discover Alleged Error in Sentencing Process Until Time for Appeal Expired — Postconviction Proceeding Not Barred: Phillips sought postconviction relief on grounds that his tribal court juvenile record had been illegally requested by the state and incorporated into the presentence investigation report and sentencing proceedings in violation of due process. The state asserted that the matter could have been raised on direct appeal and was thus inappropriate for postconviction relief. However, by the time that Phillips discovered the alleged error, the time for appeal of his conviction had passed, so the Supreme Court held that the claim was not procedurally barred from postconviction consideration. St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Only Record-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim on Appeal: Frasure claimed on appeal that her attorney provided ineffective assistance at trial by failing to object to the introduction of certain evidence. However, the Supreme Court will determine that there was ineffective assistance of counsel only if that conclusion can be based on the record on appeal or if there is no plausible justification for counsel's actions or inactions. Frasure failed to establish that her ineffective assistance claim was record-based, so the claim was dismissed without prejudice to the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 305, 323 M 479, 100 P3d 1013 (2004). See also St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003), St. v. Baker, 2013 MT 113, 370 Mont. 43, 300 P.3d 696, and St. v. Hinshaw, 2018 MT 49, 390 Mont. 372, 414 P.3d 271.

Proper Consideration in Postconviction Relief Proceedings of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims Based on Conversations off Record: In postconviction relief proceedings, Thurston contended that he was provided ineffective assistance of counsel because: (1) he had given counsel information needed to support at least seven criteria for designating Thurston as a nondangerous offender, but counsel failed to raise the mitigating information at the sentencing hearing; (2) counsel did not discuss with Thurston how to refute testimony by the state's witnesses until they were walking to the sentencing hearing and it was too late; and (3) counsel failed to provide Thurston with an accurate portrayal of the sentence contained in a plea agreement. The District Court dismissed the claims on grounds that they would have been reflected in the record and should have been raised on direct appeal. The Supreme Court disagreed. The basis for the claims rested on conversations that Thurston had with counsel outside the courtroom and thus by their very nature could not have been reflected in transcripts or the record. The Supreme Court therefore reversed and ordered the District Court to consider the issues on their merits in accordance with the ineffective assistance test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Thurston v. St., 2004 MT 142, 321 M 411, 91 P3d 1259 (2004).

Failure of Defense Counsel to Question Defendant's Mental Condition During Sentencing — Alleged Errors in Attorney Performance Properly Resolved in Postconviction Relief Proceeding: Watson petitioned for postconviction relief and claimed that defense counsel provided inadequate assistance at sentencing by not questioning whether Watson suffered from a mental disease or defect. The District Court denied the petition, determining that the ineffective assistance claim was record-based and should have been raised on direct appeal. In St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001), the Supreme Court outlined a two-step process for determining whether ineffective assistance claims should have been raised on appeal or in a postconviction hearing. First, the trial record must adequately document a challenged act or omission of defense counsel for a defendant to raise an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Second, the record on appeal must afford sufficient understanding of the reasons for counsel's act or omission to answer the threshold question of whether the alleged error expressed a trial strategy or tactical decision, and if the record does not supply the reason for counsel's act or omission, the claim must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. Here, the record was devoid of any evidence as to why counsel did not question Watson's mental condition, so Watson could not have properly raised an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Therefore, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for an evidentiary postconviction hearing to determine whether counsel's act or omission was a trial strategy or tactical decision. Watson v. St., 2002 MT 329, 313 M 209, 61 P3d 759 (2002), following Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). See also Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002).

Summary Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief — Defendant Entitled to Hearing to Present Nonrecord-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims: Schaff was convicted of deliberate homicide and filed a petition for postconviction relief, contending that he received ineffective assistance of counsel when forced to decide whether to accept a plea agreement after considering the matter for less than 2 hours. He claimed that with the assistance of different counsel at the hearing to withdraw the guilty plea, he could have established that the plea was not voluntary. Schaff further argued that he could not have raised the precise issue of ineffective assistance because discussions between his attorney and him were not record-based and thus could be presented only through a petition for postconviction relief. The state argued that the petition was defective because Schaff did not sufficiently specify the claim of ineffective assistance, offered no supporting information, and did not identify precisely why counsel was ineffective. The state also pointed out that Schaff had previously raised the issue of voluntariness in St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682 (1998), and that the issue had been decided and was barred from being raised again by the doctrine of res judicata. The Supreme Court disagreed that the voluntariness of Schaff's plea was not a proper subject for a postconviction proceeding. Although the issue of voluntariness was previously raised, Schaff did not raise the precise question of whether he had received competent advice prior to entering a plea or the question of whether he was misled to believe that he was required to proceed with the change of plea hearing with trial counsel when he was legally entitled to be represented by other counsel. The question of whether Schaff was properly advised necessarily touched on the voluntariness of the plea but was separate from it and was not part of the record in the direct appeal, nor was it the type of evidence that Schaff would be likely to present at a change of plea hearing. Rather than summarily dismiss Schaff's petition, the better course would have been for the District Court to appoint Schaff counsel and provide an opportunity for a hearing to present the ineffective assistance claims. Thus, the Supreme Court affirmed the part of the District Court's order with regard to any record-based voluntariness claims that had already been addressed by direct appeal, but reversed that part of the order that held that Schaff was procedurally barred from raising the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel in the nonrecord-based postconviction proceeding. St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001). Following hearing on remand, the District Court again denied Schaff's petition for postconviction relief, and Schaff appealed on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Applying the Strickland test, the Supreme Court found that Schaff proved neither that counsel's assistance was deficient nor that counsel's performance was prejudicial to Schaff's case. An ineffective assistance claim must be grounded on facts in the record rather than on mere conclusory allegations. Schaff's claim was not supported by the record, so the petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Schaff v. St., 2003 MT 187, 316 M 453, 73 P3d 806 (2003). See also Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), and Chyatte v. St., 2015 MT 343, 381 Mont. 534, 362 P.3d 854.

Allegation of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel That Is Not Record-Based Must Be Submitted as Petition for Postconviction Relief: Dyfort appealed his burglary conviction, claiming ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney stipulated to the admission as evidence of an accomplice's Alford plea of guilty. The Supreme Court stated that before it could reach the merits of Dyfort's claim, it had to determine if the claim was properly before it. The Supreme Court pointed out that when ineffective assistance of counsel claims are based on facts of record in the underlying case, they must be raised in the direct appeal and when the claims cannot be documented from the record, they must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. Dyfort had argued that his attorney had originally planned to not object to admission of the accomplice's plea because the attorney intended to introduce evidence to show that, as a condition of the accomplice's plea bargain, the accomplice could avoid deportation. The trial court ruled, prior to the admission of the Alford plea, that the defense counsel could not mention that the plea bargain negated the possibility of deportation. However, subsequent to the plea's admission, Dyfort's attorney failed to request a cautionary instruction to the jury concerning the limitations on the permissible use of the evidence. The Supreme Court held that the trial record did not contain facts indicating what specific tactical intentions Dyfort's attorney may have had relating to the admission of the accomplice's plea bargain, and therefore Dyfort's allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel were not record-based and had to be submitted in a petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court dismissed Dyfort's appeal without prejudice. St. v. Dyfort, 2000 MT 338, 303 M 153, 15 P3d 464, 57 St. Rep. 1438 (2000).

Petition for Postconviction Relief — Only Record-Based Claims Barred by Statute or Res Judicata: In 1993, Hagen was convicted of deliberate homicide and aggravated assault and appealed to the Montana Supreme Court, raising the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court. Hagen then filed a petition for postconviction relief, raising nine claims of ineffective assistance of counsel and argued that: (1) none of the claims could have been raised in his earlier direct appeal; (2) all claims were appropriate for his petition because an evidentiary hearing was required for all nine issues; (3) appellate counsel was ineffective in raising a particular issue in his previous direct appeal; and (4) if some or all of the claims relating to ineffective assistance of trial counsel should have been raised in his direct appeal but were not and were therefore barred, his appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance in failing to present those issues in his direct appeal. The state responded that six of Hagen's claims were procedurally barred by this section because they could have been raised in his previous appeal, that one claim was barred by res judicata because it had been raised and decided in his previous appeal, and that three of Hagen's claims were not supported by the record or by the law and could therefore be decided on their merits without an evidentiary hearing. The District Court refused Hagen's request for an evidentiary hearing on his petition for postconviction relief and dismissed the petition, holding that the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel was raised in Hagen's direct appeal and had been decided by the Supreme Court, that Hagen's adequate remedy of appeal had been pursued, and that the petition for postconviction relief failed to state a claim for relief. Hagen appealed the dismissal of the petition to the Supreme Court. As an initial observation, the Supreme Court pointed out that although all of the issues raised by Hagen in his appeal of the District Court's denial of his petition for postconviction relief concerned ineffective assistance of counsel, not all of those claims were raised in the previous direct appeal and only those claims that were raised or that could have been raised in that previous direct appeal based upon the trial record were barred by the doctrine of res judicata or subsection (2) of this section. Citing In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156 (1991), and St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611 (1995), the Supreme Court further pointed out that those issues that are not record-based are properly brought to the Supreme Court by a petition for postconviction relief and that the District Court erred in failing to make that distinction and dismissing all of Hagen's ineffective assistance claims just because some of those claims may have been legitimately barred. The Supreme Court then individually reviewed each of Hagen's ineffective assistance claims and held that: (1) the manner in which mental evaluations of Hagen were disseminated during the trial was a matter of record and was therefore barred; (2) failure of Hagen's trial counsel to object to evidence introduced at trial was a matter of record and was therefore barred; (3) eliciting certain cross-examination testimony was based upon record evidence and was barred; (4) shifting the burden of proof during counsel's closing argument was a matter of record and barred by res judicata and this section; (5) failure to investigate facts that could have provided a defense was properly raised in the postconviction relief petition because there could be no record evidence on this issue; (6) failure of trial counsel to present impeachment testimony was in part resolved during the appeal and was therefore res judicata and, with regard to one potential witness, was a matter of failure of trial counsel to investigate, could not be a matter of record, and therefore was not barred; (7) failure of trial counsel to properly prepare witnesses for trial was not and could not be reflected in the trial record and therefore was not barred; and (8) failure of appellate counsel to raise the ineffective assistance of trial counsel could not have been a matter of record evidence by its very nature and was therefore not barred from consideration in the postconviction relief petition. Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999), distinguished in Smith v. St., 2000 MT 327, 303 M 47, 15 P3d 395, 57 St. Rep. 1387 (2000). See also St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), in which the question of voluntariness of a plea because of ineffective assistance of counsel was remanded for a hearing, despite the previous disposition of other voluntariness claims on direct appeal, because discussions between defendant and counsel were not record-based and thus could be presented only through postconviction proceedings.

AMENDED PETITION

No Abuse of Discretion in Limiting Scope of Petition for Postconviction Relief to Original Petition: A motion to file an amended petition for postconviction relief was properly limited to new evidence supporting claims that were in the original petition and not new claims. Bullman v. State, 2014 MT 78, 374 Mont. 323, 321 P.3d 121.

Error in Placing Factual Allegations in Supporting Memorandum — Amendment of Petition for Postconviction Relief to Be Freely Given: Nava inadvertently placed his recitation of facts supporting his petition for postconviction relief (PCR) in his supporting memorandum rather than in his PCR petition. The Supreme Court held that leave to amend his PCR petition should be freely granted by the District Court and that to not do so was an elevation of form over substance. Nava v. St., 2011 MT 77, 360 Mont. 96, 255 P.3d 53.

Discretion of District Court to Set Time for Filing Amended Petition for Postconviction Relief: Sellner timely filed a petition for postconviction relief and subsequently filed an amended petition more than 2 years after the original petition was filed. The state contended that under Maier v. St., 2003 MT 144, 316 M 181, 69 P3d 1194 (2003), the amended petition was untimely because it was not filed within 1 year after final conviction. The Supreme Court declined to apply Maier because Maier involved the time limit applicable to the discovery of new evidence, which did not apply here. Instead, the court applied the third sentence of subsection (1)(a) of this section, which allows the District Court discretion to set deadlines as it sees fit as long as that discretion is not abused or is not subject to the new evidence deadline. Thus, Sellner's amended petition was not procedurally barred. Sellner v. St., 2004 MT 205, 322 M 310, 95 P3d 708 (2004).

No Ineffective Assistance Based on Defense Counsel's Personal Problems — Remand for Consideration of Issues in Amended Petition for Postconviction Relief: In an original petition for postconviction relief, Williams raised five issues of ineffective assistance of counsel, asserting that counsel: (1) failed to conduct proper discovery; (2) failed to obtain and call necessary witnesses at trial; (3) failed to properly question witnesses; (4) conducted inadequate trial preparation; and (5) allowed his personal problems to detract from his representation. The District Court allowed Williams to amend the petition to add two additional claims, contending that counsel failed to substitute the trial judge when requested to do so and failed to call necessary and beneficial witnesses at the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court's review of the record revealed that the District Court did not erroneously address any of the original five claims, including the assertion that defense counsel's overall emotional state adversely affected Williams's representation. However, the record showed that the two issues added by Williams in the amended petition were never addressed, so the District Court's findings regarding those two material issues were insufficient. The case was remanded to allow further consideration of the additional claims. Williams v. St., 2002 MT 189, 311 M 108, 53 P3d 864 (2002).

Dismissal of Amended Petition for Postconviction Relief — Failure to Address New Claims in Order Harmless Error — Postconviction Relief Claims Civil in Nature: On remand, petitioner amended the petition for postconviction relief, adding claims 16-18. By remanding to the District Court to allow petitioner to add proposed claims 16-18, the Supreme Court necessarily required the District Court to address the merits of those claims. However, the District Court's failure to address the new claims in its Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law and Order was harmless error. Petitioner's newly discovered evidence claims, Brady claim, and cumulative error claims were without merit. Postconviction relief proceedings are collateral attacks that are civil in nature and independent of the underlying criminal cause. If there is no showing of substantial injustice the error is harmless. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed With Supreme Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Amend Pleadings on Remand: Boucher filed with the Supreme Court for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court remanded to District Court for an evidentiary hearing on whether Boucher was denied effective assistance of counsel because of counsel's failure to investigate and formulate a defense based on the victim's history of making false accusations of sexual assault. On remand, Boucher sought to offer additional evidence of ineffective counsel unrelated to the issue remanded. Although a District Court has the discretion to grant or deny a motion to amend a postconviction petition when the petition is filed with that court, in cases like this when the petition is originally filed with the Supreme Court and remanded, the District Court does not have authority to grant leave to amend the pleadings to include allegations not included in the original petition. St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), distinguishing Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997), and Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

SECOND OR SUBSEQUENT PETITION

Second Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Procedurally or Time Barred: After a 1995 petition for postconviction relief was denied, Beach filed in 2008 for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence, but the District Court, without a hearing, denied the petition on grounds that it was procedurally and time barred. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The 2008 petition claimed that the newly discovered evidence was only recently available and thus could not have been raised in the 1995 petition. Since nothing indicated a lack of diligence on Beach's part in locating the new evidence, the Supreme Court granted Beach the benefit of the doubt as to whether he acted with sufficient alacrity in locating the new evidence, so the 2008 petition was not procedurally barred. To determine whether Beach would be entitled to a new trial based on newly discovered evidence, the court applied the criteria in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), regarding a trial court's consideration of what impact new evidence might have when looking prospectively at a new trial with a new jury. The court concluded that the District Court abused its discretion by denying the petition without holding an evidentiary hearing on the new evidence. The case was remanded to allow a hearing to evaluate whether the evidence was actually newly discovered and whether a reasonable jury would have found Beach guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. The newly discovered evidence must be material to the issues at trial and neither cumulative nor merely impeaching, and in order to prevail on a substantive innocence claim, Beach was required to show by clear and convincing evidence that but for a procedural error, no reasonable juror would have found him guilty. Beach v. St., 2009 MT 398, 353 M 411, 220 P3d 667 (2009). See also Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622 (1999), and St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P3d 1232 (2003).

On remand, the District Court concluded that Beach had presented sufficient evidence of his actual innocence to warrant a new trial, and the state appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. To overcome the presumption of guilt that arises from a conviction at trial, an actual innocence petitioner must show that new reliable evidence — whether it be exculpatory scientific evidence, trustworthy eyewitness accounts, or critical physical evidence — when viewed against the trial evidence demonstrates the petitioner is actually innocent of the crime for which the petitioner was convicted. An actual innocence claim may be either substantive or procedural. A substantive innocence petitioner must show by clear and convincing evidence that no reasonable juror would find the petitioner guilty, whereas a procedural innocence petitioner must merely show that it is likely or probable that no reasonable jury would find the petitioner guilty. While a substantive innocence petitioner who satisfies the burden of proof is forever exonerated, a procedural innocence petitioner who satisfies the burden of proof merely avoids the application of procedural bars and is allowed to present claims of constitutional trial error at a postconviction hearing. After reviewing both the new and old evidence, the Supreme Court concluded that the District Court erred in considering only the new evidence and that Beach did not provide reliable evidence to demonstrate either substantive or procedural actual innocence. St. v. Beach, 2013 MT 130, 370 Mont. 163, 302 P.3d 47.

Only One Amendment Allowed to Petition for Postconviction Relief: A petitioner may amend a petition for postconviction relief only once. A second or subsequent petition must be dismissed unless the second or subsequent petition raises grounds for relief that could not reasonably have been raised in the original or amended petition. St. v. Evert, 2007 MT 30, 336 M 36, 152 P3d 713 (2007).

Third Petition for Postconviction Relief Barred as Successive Petition: Hawkins filed a petition for postconviction relief in District Court in 1983, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. Hawkins filed a similar petition in 1997. In 1998, Hawkins petitioned the Supreme Court for postconviction relief in an original proceeding, which the court allowed, ordering the state to file a supplemental response addressing the merits of Hawkins' petition. The state responded that the petition should be barred as a successive petition. The Supreme Court noted that the 1998 petition was, in effect, Hawkins' third petition alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. Nothing in Montana statutory law allows a petitioner three chances to present a claim for collateral relief. Hawkins' claims could reasonably have been raised in the original petition, so pursuant to this section, the 1998 claim was barred as a successive petition. Hawkins v. Mahoney, 1999 MT 82, 294 M 124, 979 P2d 697, 56 St. Rep. 345 (1999).

Issue Known but Not Appreciated and Thus Not Raised in First Petition — Pro Se Petitioner Held to Same Standard as Attorney: Bromgard knew of the jury experiment when, acting pro se, he filed his first petition for postconviction relief but failed to include the experiment as a ground for relief. He claimed that the issue of jury misconduct could not reasonably have been raised in the first petition because at the time of the first petition, he was unaware of the legal significance of the experiment. He also claimed that his failure to include the experiment in the first petition should be excused because he was not represented by counsel in filing the first petition. The lower court did not err in barring the experiment claim from a second petition on the grounds that it could reasonably have been raised in the first petition. In addition, Bromgard knew when he filed his first petition that his trial lawyer did not challenge the experiment in any posttrial motion. Therefore, Bromgard could not, in his second petition, raise the failure to challenge as ineffective assistance of counsel because he could reasonably have raised the issue in the first petition. A person appearing pro se in appealing the denial of a petition for postconviction relief is held to the same standards as an attorney. St. v. Bromgard, 285 M 170, 948 P2d 182, 54 St. Rep. 1096 (1997).

Error to Fail to Hold Hearing on Good Cause for Not Raising Grounds in First Petition: Whether grounds for relief raised in a second petition of postconviction relief could reasonably have been raised in the first petition and whether good cause could be shown why those grounds were not raised in the first petition were questions of fact best left to the District Court. (See 1995 amendment.) The District Court, without a hearing on the matter, erroneously denied the second petition on the grounds that the issue sought to be raised could have been raised on direct appeal. A further error, requiring a vacation of the denial and a remand, occurred because lack of a hearing prevented a determination of whether the grounds raised in the second petition could have been raised in the first petition. If the grounds could have been raised initially, the second petition should be denied, and if they could not have been raised, the merits of the second petition should be decided. St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611, 52 St. Rep. 947 (1995), followed in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

DECISION ON PARTICULAR CLAIMS

Postconviction Relief — Newly Discovered Evidence Requirement Not Met — Ineffective Assistance of Appellate Counsel Alleged. Crabtree v. St., 2022 MT 133, 409 Mont. 211, 512 P.3d 1187.

Ineffective Assistance Claims Not Substantiated: A petitioner for postconviction relief alleged that his trial counsel's performance was ineffective on several grounds, including improperly portraying the petitioner during opening statements and failing to advise the petitioner of his right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court concluded that the petitioner failed to substantiate any of his allegations that his counsel's performance was deficient and failed to establish that any error of his pretrial and trial counsel prejudiced his right to a fair trial. Rukes v. St., 2013 MT 56, 369 Mont. 215, 297 P.3d 1195.

No Ineffective Assistance by Trial Counsel or Appellate Counsel — Petition for Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: In a homicide trial, the defendant's trial counsel did not render ineffective assistance by failing to object to statements made by the prosecution during closing arguments or by failing to request a test of an allegedly exculpatory handprint, even though the handprint was determined not to be from the defendant or the victim following the defendant's conviction. Similarly, appellate counsel acted reasonably by appealing only those issues that could have affected the defendant's conviction and sentence. Rosling v. St., 2012 MT 179, 366 Mont. 50, 285 P.3d 486.

No Showing of Ineffective Counsel — Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: In a petition for postconviction relief, DuBray asserted ineffective assistance of trial and appellate counsel based on: (1) trial counsel's introduction of prejudicial issues during trial; (2) trial counsel's conflict of interest; (3) failure of trial counsel to ensure DuBray's presence at all critical stages of the trial; and (4) appellate counsel's failure to raise issues 2 and 3 on appeal. The District Court found no ineffective assistance and denied DuBray's petition, and on appeal, the Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed. Counsel's actions regarding the introduction of allegedly prejudicial issues were made for tactical reasons and stemmed from informed professional deliberation, and DuBray could not demonstrate that counsel's actions were deficient. Defense counsel clearly revealed the potential conflict of interest within the trial record, so that claim was procedurally barred by this section. The claim that counsel erred by not ensuring DuBray's presence at all critical trial stages could have been raised on direct appeal and thus was procedurally barred from consideration in postconviction proceedings. DuBray's contention of error by appellate counsel for failure to raise the conflict of interest claim failed because DuBray did not establish that trial counsel actively represented conflicting interests and because DuBray himself stated that he did not wish to discharge trial counsel merely because counsel had a previous attorney-client relationship with a potentially adverse party. Last, DuBray's assertion that he might have demanded that trial counsel act differently had DuBray been present during interactions between the trial court and the jury foreman was pure speculation, particularly given that DuBray deferred to counsel on such matters. DuBray's postconviction petition was properly denied. DuBray v. St., 2008 MT 121, 342 M 520, 182 P3d 753 (2008). In Marble v. St., 2015 MT 242, 380 Mont. 366, 355 P.3d 742, the Supreme Court overruled DuBray to the extent it applied the fifth factor in the Clark test to a petition for postconviction relief that is based upon newly discovered evidence.

Claims of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Properly Denied Absent Showing of Prejudice: Hartinger filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds that he received ineffective assistance because his counsel: (1) failed to file a notice of appeal; (2) failed to move to suppress Hartinger's incriminating statements; (3) failed to move to suppress newly discovered evidence; and (4) incorrectly conducted voir dire. The petition was denied, and Hartinger appealed. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed, noting that ineffective assistance claims must stem from counsel's neglect or ignorance rather than from informed, professional deliberation. First, Hartinger understood the right to file an out-of-time appeal but knowingly and intentionally waived that right, instead choosing to file for postconviction relief, so Hartinger could claim no prejudice from counsel's failure to file an appeal. Second, even if Hartinger's incriminating statements should have been suppressed, there was more than enough evidence to support the conviction, so no prejudice accrued. Third, counsel's decision to not suppress newly discovered evidence was an informed, tactical decision that did not constitute deficient performance. Fourth, counsel's tactic of using a peremptory challenge to remove a prospective juror who voiced pro-police views during voir dire was a reasonable trial tactic, reaffirmed the essence of voir dire, and could not be viewed as deficient performance. Hartinger v. St., 2007 MT 141, 337 M 432, 162 P3d 95 (2007).

No Prejudice Shown in Incorporation of Tribal Court Juvenile Record Into Sentencing Procedure — Due Process Not Violated: Phillips sought postconviction relief on grounds that his tribal court juvenile record had been illegally requested by the state and incorporated into the presentence investigation report and sentencing proceedings in violation of due process. The petition was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed without addressing the issue of release of the record under tribal law. Phillips did not present any evidence that the juvenile record or any information in the presentence investigation report was materially inaccurate, that the tribal court record influenced placement with the Department of Corrections, or that he was prejudiced by the tribal court record in violation of due process, so dismissal of the petition for postconviction relief was not erroneous. St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Defense Counsel's Trial Tactics Not Basis for Ineffective Assistance Claim — Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: Garrett filed a petition for postconviction relief, asserting that trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by lack of preparation and deficient presentation, failure to make timely hearsay objections, failure to obtain a defense expert and call witnesses, and failure to offer adequate jury instructions and to assert affirmative defenses. The District Court denied the petition, and on appeal, the Supreme Court considered each assertion and affirmed.

The decision whether and when to make an opening statement is a matter of trial tactics that do not form the basis for an ineffective assistance claim, and decisions regarding the timing and number of objections also lie within trial counsel's tactical discretion. The decision not to call a handwriting expert for the defense was not ineffective assistance because Garrett admitted altering the documents on which the expert would have testified. The 10 jury instructions offered by defense counsel were consciously and tactically chosen to further the chosen defense theory. Counsel's decisions regarding the calling of potential witnesses and other tactical decisions at trial, did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness required to find ineffective assistance of counsel, and the petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Garrett v. St., 2005 MT 197, 328 M 165, 119 P3d 55 (2005).

Failure to Meet Strickland Burden Demonstrating Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Petition for Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: Following conviction for deliberate homicide and a failed direct appeal, Elliott filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief alleging 12 separate instances of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial and on direct appeal. The District Court held a hearing at which counsel testified and then denied the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel, examined the alleged instances of counsel ineffectiveness, and concluded that Elliott failed to overcome the strong presumption that counsels' defense strategies and trial tactics fell within the wide range of sound professional decisions. Elliott also failed to demonstrate prejudice or a reasonable probability that the result of the proceedings would have been different had counsel not performed ineffectively. Failing the Strickland test, denial of Elliott's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. Elliott v. St., 2005 MT 10, 325 M 345, 106 P3d 517 (2005), distinguished in Wilkes v. St., 2015 MT 243, 380 Mont. 388, 355 P.3d 755. See also St. v. Koughl, 2004 MT 243, 323 M 6, 97 P3d 2095 (2004), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Evidence Provided at Trial Not Considered Newly Discovered Evidence — Postconviction Claim Time-Barred: Oatman failed to bring a claim for postconviction relief within the 5-year statute of limitations under the 1993 version of 46-21-102 that was in effect at the time of conviction, so the claim was time-barred. Nevertheless, Oatman contended that the claim should be considered based on newly discovered evidence that a victim had contradicted the allegation of robbery. However, the jury heard the testimony at trial, so the evidence could not be considered to be newly discovered. The alleged new evidence did not extend the statute of limitations, so denial of Oatman's claim was proper. Oatman v. St., 2004 MT 360, 324 M 472, 104 P3d 1048 (2004).

Increased Sentence Imposed on Resentencing After Original Sentence Vacated Not Due Process Violation: After Redfern's petition for postconviction relief was granted, Redfern's original sentence was vacated and the District Court resentenced him to a greater period of potential imprisonment and supervision than the original sentence. Redfern appealed the new sentence, contending that the greater sentence on resentencing violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under N.C. v. Pearce 395 US 711 (1969), neither double jeopardy nor equal protection bars imposition of a more severe sentence upon resentencing after an original conviction is set aside unless a heavier sentence is imposed to punish a defendant for successfully having the original conviction set aside. However, in order to meet due process requirements and allow full appellate review of the constitutional legitimacy of the sentence, a longer sentence on resentencing after a new trial must be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of the defendant after the original sentencing and reasons for the longer sentence must affirmatively appear on the record. Both conditions were met here, there was no showing that the more severe sentence was imposed as retaliatory motivation by the sentencing judge, and the new sentence was within statutory sentencing parameters. St. v. Redfern, 2004 MT 277, 323 M 225, 99 P3d 223 (2004), following St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363 (1988), and St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), and distinguishing St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001). Redfern was followed in St. v. Bullplume, 2011 MT 40, 359 Mont. 289 251 P.3d 114.

Miscarriage of Justice Exception to Statute of Limitations for Postconviction Relief Applicable Only to Claim of Discovery of New Evidence — Recanted Victim Testimony Not Considered New Evidence: Maier cited 12 grounds for postconviction relief, including a claim alleging that newly discovered evidence in the form of the victim's recantation established that Maier did not commit attempted deliberate homicide. The District Court held that 10 of the claims were procedurally barred by this section, that 1 claim was improper under the facts of the case, and that the final claim of newly discovered evidence merited a response by the state. The state contended that the final claim was barred by 46-21-102 because it was not raised within 1 year of final judgment. The District Court rejected the state's argument, but denied the claim anyway, and Maier appealed.

The Supreme Court considered the nexus between 46-21-102 and this section, which address amendments to petitions for postconviction relief and require that amended claims alleging the existence of newly discovered evidence be filed within 1 year of final conviction or within 1 year of the time that the petitioner discovered or reasonably should have discovered the existence of the evidence, whichever is later. In this case, Maier discovered the evidence when the victim of the attempted deliberate homicide recanted testimony given at trial, but Maier's amended petition was not filed until more than 2 years after the recantation. Under St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001), the 1-year statute of limitation may be waived only if justified by a clear miscarriage of justice that renders the judgment a complete nullity, and under St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313 (2000), the newly discovered evidence must establish that the defendant did not commit the offense for the miscarriage of justice exception to apply. Here, the victim never actually stated that Maier was not the person who shot him, but only mentioned that he could not see the shooter because he was hiding. However, two other persons testified that Maier was the shooter, so the recanted testimony did not in itself establish that Maier did not commit attempted deliberate homicide. Thus, the miscarriage of justice exception did not apply, Maier's petition was not timely, and the District Court erred by not denying the claim on procedural grounds. Nevertheless, the proper result was reached, if for the wrong reason, so the District Court was sustained. Maier v. St., 2003 MT 144, 316 M 181, 69 P3d 1194 (2003).

Partially Deficient Performance of Trial Counsel — Not Sufficient Prejudice to Warrant New Trial: The District Court found that Hagen's trial counsel could have done a better job of investigating and presenting testimony regarding an alleged reputation for violence and prior criminal record on the part of the victim of Hagen's aggravated assault and that counsel could have done a more thorough job of interviewing and preparing witnesses, but held that even though Hagen may have suffered some prejudice as a result of trial counsel's deficiencies, Hagen did not show that but for the deficiencies, the results of the trial would have been different. The District Court concluded that Hagen was provided reasonably effective assistance of counsel and received a fair trial. The court also concluded that Hagen failed to meet the heavy burden of showing that appellate counsel was ineffective. Hagen appealed on grounds of ineffective assistance, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the framework of Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984), it is entirely possible to find attorney error that possibly prejudiced defendant, yet conclude that the error did not rise to a level serious enough to result in a verdict unworthy of confidence. After examining all the alleged shortcomings of Hagen's trial and appellate counsel's representations, the Supreme Court agreed that counsel's performance was reasonably effective and that the combined effect of all the acts and omissions was not sufficient to undermine confidence in the trial outcome. St. v. Hagen, 2002 MT 190, 311 M 117, 53 P3d 885 (2002), followed in St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005). See also St. v. Daniels, 210 M 1, 682 P2d 173 (1984).

Record Devoid of Pretrial Tactical Decisions — Evidentiary Hearing Required on Ineffective Assistance Claim: In St. v. Soraich, 1999 MT 87, 294 M 175, 979 P2d 206 (1999), the Supreme Court held that the prosecutor in Soraich's murder trial was entitled to comment on a theory suggested by defense counsel because the theory lacked evidentiary support and because the comments were plainly in response to defense counsel's opening statements. Soraich then filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming that defense counsel rendered ineffective assistance by stating that counsel would prove that the state's key witness gave inconsistent statements, without first determining whether an investigator's statement could be introduced as impeachment evidence. The District Court denied the petition, holding that Soraich should have raised the ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal because the claim was based on facts of record in the underlying case, so the claim was procedurally barred from postconviction review. To determine whether the ineffective assistance claim should have been raised on direct appeal or in a postconviction hearing, the Supreme Court cited the two-part process in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). First, the trial record must adequately document a challenged act or omission of defense counsel for the defendant to raise an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Second, the record on appeal must afford sufficient understanding of the reason for counsel's act or omission to answer the threshold question of whether the alleged error expresses a trial strategy or tactical decision, and if the record does not supply the reason for counsel's act or omission, the claim must be raised by postconviction relief. The record here did not contain any information about why defense counsel promised the jury that the investigator's testimony would prove Soraich's defense, but then failed to call the investigator as a witness. Without an evidentiary hearing and direct questioning of defense counsel, any guesses on what led to the failure to call the investigator as a witness were purely speculative. Because the record was devoid of counsel's pretrial tactical decisions, Soraich could not satisfy the second prong of the Strickland test, so this section did not bar Soraich's postconviction assertion of ineffective assistance at trial. An evidentiary hearing was necessary to address the second prong of the Strickland test, and the District Court improperly dismissed Soraich's petition for postconviction relief. Therefore, the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the ineffective assistance claim. Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002). On remand, the District Court again denied relief, holding that under the second prong of the Strickland test, any allegedly deficient performance of counsel did not prejudice Soraich. Soraich appealed again, asserting that counsel's failure to call a witness to impeach a state witness resulted in prejudice. The Supreme Court disagreed. The witness had already been impeached through the testimony of another defense witness and by cross-examination concerning all of the inconsistencies in the questionable testimony. Failure to call another witness to establish the same point did not create a reasonable probability that the trial result would have been different and did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court was affirmed. Soraich v. St., 2004 MT 215, 322 M 375, 97 P3d 529 (2004). See also St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001).

Failure to Present Medical Records and Failure to Move to Withdraw Guilty Plea — No Denial of Effective Assistance of Counsel: The appellant pleaded guilty to a possession of dangerous drugs charge. Sentencing was postponed so that the appellant could undergo drug and alcohol counseling and a hernia operation. At the time of sentencing, the appellant's partial medical records from Fort Harrison dealt only with the appellant's substance abuse issues and hernia problem and did not mention any psychiatric problems. Later reports received by the counsel would have indicated a need to request a psychiatric examination. The counsel's performance in allowing the District Court to sentence the appellant without presenting his medical records from Fort Harrison was not deficient. When the counsel testified that the first time that an issue of schizophrenia or other mental illness arose was in the petition for postconviction relief and the District Court found that the trial counsel had not been informed of any psychiatric issues, it was not error for the counsel to not move to withdraw the guilty plea immediately after the plea hearing. The Supreme Court refused to disturb the District Court findings that were supported by substantial evidence and were not otherwise clearly erroneous. St. v. Cady, 2000 MT 353, 303 M 258, 15 P3d 479, 57 St. Rep. 1491 (2000).

Claims of Abuse of Process and Outrageous Governmental Conduct — No Basis for Postconviction Relief: In a petition for postconviction relief, defendant claimed abuse of process and outrageous governmental conduct that could have been addressed or remedied at the trial level, including: (1) manipulation of jurisdiction and witnesses to ensure the possible application of the death penalty; (2) use of an out-of-state crime lab; (3) mishandling of evidence; and (4) use of facially invalid witness testimony. The Supreme Court addressed each allegation as follows and found no abuse or outrageous conduct: (1) As long as the state has jurisdiction over a crime, the decision to bring charges in state court rather than federal court or in one state's court rather than another's properly rests with the discretion of the prosecutor. The prosecution of other defendants in the case in federal court and the offering of plea bargains and use of other witnesses' testimony against defendant suited the degree of culpability of the witnesses. (2) Use of the crime lab of the state in which the crime was discovered and the sharing of resources between the states were proper. (3) The prosecution properly established the chain of evidence regarding the evidence allegedly mishandled and satisfactorily explained that the change in certain evidence between the time of the crime and the time of trial was due to laboratory testing. (4) There was no indication that the prosecutor knew that one witness's testimony was false, and the use of the testimony at trial was insufficient to warrant reversal of the conviction. Four other theories of abuse of process or outrageous governmental conduct were not properly raised and thus were not addressed by the Supreme Court. Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel at Trial and on Appeal — Not Established: The defendant argued that his trial and appeal attorneys did not argue his case fully. The Supreme Court reviewed the record and held that the attorneys had presented the strongest arguments in the defendant's favor and had performed in a competent manner. In re Petition of Martin, 240 M 419, 787 P2d 746, 46 St. Rep. 2213 (1989).

46-21-110. Petition for DNA testing.Compiler's Comments

2015 Amendment: Chapter 313 in (1) near beginning after "convicted of a felony" deleted "who is serving a term of incarceration"; substituted (5)(a) through (5)(d) related to petitions for former (5)(a) through (5)(e) that read: "(a) the evidence to be tested:

- (i) was secured in relation to the trial that resulted in the conviction;
 - (ii) is available; and
 - (iii) is in a condition that would permit the requested testing;
- (b) the evidence to be tested has been subject to a chain of custody sufficient to establish that it has not been substituted, tampered with, degraded, contaminated, altered, or replaced in any material aspect;
- (c) the identity of the perpetrator of the felony was or should have been a significant issue in the case;
- (d) the petitioner has made a prima facie showing that the evidence sought to be tested is material to the question of whether the petitioner was the perpetrator of the felony that resulted in the conviction;
- (e) the requested testing results would establish, in light of all the evidence, whether the petitioner was the perpetrator of the felony that resulted in the conviction"; inserted (7) and (8) concerning court orders after a petition has been filed and other relevant evidence; in (11) in second sentence substituted "results inculcate" for "results are not favorable to"; in (12) substituted current text related to favorable test results for former (10) that read: "(10) If the test results are favorable to the petitioner, the court shall order a hearing and after the hearing shall make appropriate orders pursuant to applicable statutes regarding postconviction proceedings"; inserted (13) related to DNA identification; inserted (16) related to motions to vacate based on DNA evidence; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 27, 2015.

Effective Date: This section is effective October 1, 2003.

Case Notes

Request for DNA Testing When Results Would Not Exonerate Defendant — Petition for Postconviction Testing Properly Denied: The defendant was convicted of felony sexual assault on a child. Although DNA testing of the child did not implicate the defendant, an eyewitness testified at trial that he saw the defendant molesting the child. Subsequently, the defendant filed a postconviction petition for further DNA testing of the child's underwear and of other adults known to the child. The District Court denied the petition and the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed the denial and agreed with the District Court that the defendant had not established that the requested DNA would exonerate him as required under the statute. Golden v. St., 2014 MT 141, 375 Mont. 222, 326 P.3d 430.

No Requirement That Unmeritorious Petition Be Returned: The District Court denied Haffey's petition for postconviction DNA testing. Haffey contended that the court should have returned the petition and advised Haffey of the deficiencies according to the procedure in 46-21-110(2). The Supreme Court disagreed. The provision related to return of the petition applies when a petition is missing required information, but does not preclude a District Court from denying a petition that is facially incapable of meeting the substantive requirements of 46-21-110(5). Thus, even though Haffey's petition might not have contained all the required information, the information it did contain was sufficient to demonstrate that the petition was without merit, and the District Court did not err in summarily dismissing the petition. Haffey v. St., 2010 MT 97, 356 Mont. 198, 233 P.3d 315.

Postconviction Petition for DNA Testing Properly Dismissed — Identity Not at Issue: Haffey filed a postconviction petition requesting DNA testing of a blood stain found in a vehicle that was involved in a collision with a pedestrian for which Haffey was convicted of felony assault. Haffey asserted that DNA testing would prove that the blood was Haffey's and that Haffey was a passenger in the vehicle, rather than the driver, and was thus not responsible for the collision. The District Court denied the petition on grounds that: (1) Haffey had not shown that identity was or should have been a significant issue in the case; (2) Haffey did not show how, in light of the evidence, DNA testing would establish innocence; and (3) Haffey could not meet the chain of custody requirements. Haffey appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The court first found that, contrary to the District Court's reasoning, it was irrelevant to an identity determination whether eyewitnesses at the scene of the crime recalled seeing one or two vehicle occupants and that the observation that the requested DNA testing would not produce evidence inconsistent with Haffey's guilt was not relevant to the significance of the identity question. Therefore, the District Court erred in holding that identity was not a significant issue in the case. However, the District Court correctly concluded that DNA testing could not establish Haffey's innocence. Haffey argued at trial that the only blood in the vehicle was his, so DNA proof that the blood was indeed Haffey's would not establish whether Haffey was the perpetrator, but would only provide further cumulative evidence that Haffey was in the vehicle. Because this element of the use of postconviction DNA could not be established, the Supreme Court did not reach the chain of custody question, but instead affirmed denial of Haffey's petition for postconviction DNA testing. Haffey v. St., 2010 MT 97, 356 Mont. 198, 233 P.3d 315. See also Golden v. St., 2014 MT 141, 375 Mont. 222, 326 P.3d 430.

46-21-111. Preservation and disposal of biological evidence obtained in criminal proceeding.

Compiler's Comments

2017 Amendment: Chapter 358 in (1)(b) at end of first sentence substituted "public defender division administrator" for "chief public defender". Amendment effective July 1, 2017.

Severability: Section 48, Ch. 358, L. 2017, was a severability clause.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 221 throughout section in eight places substituted reference to a law enforcement agency for reference to the state; in (1)(a) near beginning of first sentence, in (1)(b) near beginning of first and second sentences, and in (1)(c) near beginning before "evidence" substituted "biological" for "scientific identification"; in (1)(b) at end of first sentence after "person" inserted "and the Montana chief public defender"; inserted (2) requiring permanent preservation of remaining biological evidence following completion of laboratory analysis; inserted (3) defining biological evidence and DNA; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Effective Date: This section is effective October 1, 2003.

Part 2 Action of Court

46-21-201. Proceedings on petition.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Subsection (1) is similar to 1987 MCA 46-21-201(1). With regard to subsection (2), the Commission determined that if the allegations of the petition were serious enough to warrant hearing, counsel should be appointed if the petitioner is indigent. Subsection (3) provides the option of using civil discovery procedures. This will give the court and counsel the opportunity to streamline the proceedings with depositions and other civil-type discovery if necessary. Subsection (4) is similar to 1987 MCA 46-21-201(2). Subsection (5) is similar to 1987 MCA 46-21-201(3), except that the reference to writ is eliminated and the result is simply that the petition is dismissed.

Uniform State Law — Note on Commission Comments: The following states have enacted the Uniform Post-Conviction Procedure Act: Arkansas, Idaho, Iowa, Maryland, Minnesota, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, and South Dakota.

The commission comments summarize the Uniform Commission Comments and distinguish Montana changes to the U.P.C.A., thus the Uniform Commission Comments are not set forth.

Source: 22 U.S.C., 2255; U.P.C.A., Section 7.

This section merely establishes the method of procedure. It allows the court discretion as to whether the petitioner need be present. This is substantially the same as the present law in Montana on habeas corpus.

This section provides that proceedings may be heard in the court in which the conviction took place, serving to facilitate the flow of post-conviction hearings. The court is authorized to receive proof by affidavits, depositions, oral testimony or other evidence. The language is broad and general in order not to cast a heavy burden on the petitioner. The prisoner need not be brought before the court. This provision is designed to make possible the rapid disposal of petitions which have no real merit and which may be filed merely to give the petitioner a free trip and a few days outside the penitentiary. The court, if it deems it necessary, may order the petitioner to be brought before it. This section was drafted to give the court broad powers in disposal of the petition. Therefore, error in the original proceedings need not cause the release of a guilty party. The court may order the correction of judgment or sentence.

2017 Amendment: Chapter 358 in (2) substituted "2-15-1029" for "47-1-201"; in (3)(a) after "public defender" deleted "provided for in 47-1-201"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2017.

Severability: Section 48, Ch. 358, L. 2017, was a severability clause.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 51 in (1)(a) inserted second sentence regarding the attorney general's response to the petition; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Applicability: Section 2, Ch. 51, L. 2009, provided: "[This act] applies to a petition for postconviction relief filed on or after October 1, 2009."

2005 Amendment: (Version effective July 1, 2006) Chapter 449 in (2) after "shall" deleted "appoint" and inserted reference to ordering office of state public defender to assign counsel, after "qualifies for the" deleted "appointment" and inserted "assignment", and after "part 1" inserted reference to Montana Public Defender Act; in (3)(a) after "indigent" inserted reference to 47-1-103, after "will" deleted "appoint" and inserted reference to ordering office of state public defender to assign counsel, after "court's standards" inserted reference to office of state public defender's standards, and after "competency of" deleted "appointed" and inserted "assigned"; in (3)(b)(i) at beginning before "counsel" deleted "appoint" and inserted reference to ordering office of state public defender to assign counsel, after first "person" substituted "pending a determination by the office of state public defender" for "if the court finds", after "indigent" inserted reference to 47-1-103, after "offer of" deleted "appointment" and inserted "assigned counsel", and near end before "counsel" deleted "appointed" and inserted "assigned"; in (3)(b)(ii) after first "offer" inserted "of assigned counsel"; in (3)(b)(iii) before "petitioner" deleted "court finds that the", after "is" inserted "determined", after "not" inserted "to be", and after "deny" deleted "appointment" and inserted reference to rescinding order requiring assignment of counsel; in (3)(c) at beginning deleted "The court may not appoint counsel" and inserted reference to office of state public defender assigning counsel and at end deleted "appointment" and inserted "assignment"; in (3)(d) before "not" inserted "determined", after "not" inserted "to be", after "indigent" deleted "at the time that the court's determination is made under subsection (3)(b)", and after "shall" deleted "appoint" and inserted "order the assignment of"; in (3)(e) after "counsel" deleted "appointed" and inserted "assigned" and after "paid" deleted "as provided in 46-8-201" and inserted reference to office of state public defender; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Contingent Effective Date — Standards Effective January 1, 2000: Section 10(2), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "The provision in [section 6] [enacting 46-21-201(3)(a)] that the notification must state that counsel to be appointed will meet supreme court standards for counsel is effective on [the effective date of standards adopted under section 7]." On June 29, 1999, the Montana supreme court issued an order adopting standards for competency of counsel in capital cases. The standards are effective January 1, 2000. The standards govern the trial, appeal, and postconviction relief phases. The standards are set forth in the Montana Supreme Court rules contained in the annotations to Art. VII, sec. 2, Mont. Const.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 378 in (1)(a), near end of second sentence after "may", substituted "proceed to" for "grant a prompt hearing on the petition" and at end, after "issue", deleted "and make findings of fact and conclusions with respect to the petition"; inserted (1)(b) regarding issuance of a decision in a death sentence case; inserted (1)(c) regarding applicability of the Rules of Civil Procedure; in (2), at beginning after "If", inserted "the death sentence has not been imposed and"; inserted (3) regarding appointment of counsel in a death sentence appeal; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1997.

Attorney General Petition to Supreme Court for Competency Standards: Section 7, Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "Within 60 days after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997], the attorney general shall, in compliance with 28 U.S.C. 2261, petition the supreme court for a court order establishing standards for competency of counsel appointed to represent indigent persons in proceedings under Title 46, chapter 21, who are sentenced to death. The court may hold appropriate proceedings on the petition, appoint a commission to advise it on competency standards, and adopt standards."

Severability: Section 8, Ch. 378, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 9(1), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "Except as provided in subsection (2), [sections 3 through 6] [amending 46-21-101, 46-21-102, 46-21-105, and 46-21-201] apply to proceedings in which the conviction becomes final:

(a) after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]; or
 (b) during the 12 months prior to the [effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997] if a petition under Title 46, chapter 21, is filed within the 12 months after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997].”

Section 9(2), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: “The provision in [section 6] [enacting 46-21-201(3)(a)] that the notification must state that counsel to be appointed will meet supreme court standards for counsel applies to petitions for postconviction relief filed after [the effective date of standards adopted under section 7].”

1991 Amendment: Inserted (2) concerning appointed counsel for a hearing; inserted (3) concerning discovery; in (5) substituted “prosecution” for “state” and at end substituted “petition must be dismissed” for “petitioner shall be returned to the custody of the person to whom the writ was directed”; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: In (1), following “conviction took place”, inserted “and the attorney general and order them to file a responsive pleading to the petition. Following its review of the responsive pleading, the court may dismiss the petition as a matter of law for failure to state a claim for relief or it may”.

Case Notes

Record Insufficient to Rule on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel on Direct Appeal — Conviction Affirmed Without Prejudice to Ineffective Assistance Claim — Proper for Postconviction Proceedings: The defendant was charged with deliberate homicide and attempted deliberate homicide. At trial, the prosecution played two interviews of the defendant with no objection from the defense counsel. In the interviews, the defendant talked about his prior criminal history and how he had come to know the victims, who he had alleged tried to kill him. After his conviction, he appealed to the Supreme Court and claimed that he had received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney had not objected to the interviews being seen by the jury. The Supreme Court concluded that, based on the record, it could only speculate why counsel had chosen not to object. It therefore affirmed the conviction without prejudice to allow the defendant to assert the ineffective assistance of counsel claim in postconviction proceedings. St. v Sawyer, 2019 MT 93, 395 Mont. 309, 439 P.3d 931. See also St. v. Ward, 2020 MT 36, 399 Mont. 16, 457 P.3d 955.

Claim of Ineffective Assistance by Direct Appeal Inappropriate When Record Does Not Fully Explain Counsel's Action: The defendant was convicted of aggravated burglary and sexual intercourse without consent and argued on direct appeal that his counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to obtain an independent medical expert to review the records of the physical examination of the victim. However, the Supreme Court held that because the record did not fully explain why an independent medical examination was not obtained, the defendant should pursue his claim in a proceeding for postconviction relief. Longjaw v. St., 2012 MT 243, 366 Mont. 472, 288 P.3d 210. See also St. v. Ward, 2020 MT 36, 399 Mont. 16, 457 P.3d 955.

Conviction Overturned at Postconviction Hearing — Retrial Not Violative of Double Jeopardy: A defendant's right to be free from double jeopardy did not prevent the state from reprosecuting him after his conviction was overturned by the postconviction court for prosecutorial misconduct and ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Duncan, 2012 MT 241, 366 Mont. 443, 291 P.3d 106.

Public Defender Not to Be Appointed for Postconviction Relief Except in Compliance With Statutory Timeline: The District Court ordered that a public defender be appointed since the interests of justice required it, even though a response by the state to a petition for postconviction relief had not been filed. The Supreme Court granted a writ of supervisory control and held on the merits that because there was a chance that a public defender might be appointed in cases in which the District Court would hold that the court-ordered response showed the petitioner was not entitled to relief under any circumstances, thus wasting the resources of the Office of State Public Defender, a public defender may be appointed by a District Court in a postconviction proceeding only after the court has received and reviewed the court-ordered response to the petition in compliance with 46-21-201. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. 18th Judicial District Court, 2011 MT 97, 360 Mont. 284, 255 P.3d 107.

Postconviction Claim of Ineffective Counsel Unfounded — Evidentiary Hearing Not Required: Following Hamilton's conviction for felony incest, he filed for postconviction relief on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel and requested an evidentiary hearing. The District Court dismissed the claim without holding an evidentiary hearing and Hamilton appealed. The Supreme Court held that a hearing was not necessary because Hamilton failed to meet the threshold requirement that the petition identify facts justifying relief. The Supreme Court also held that Hamilton failed to state claims for relief. The court examined each of Hamilton's ineffective assistance claims and concluded that Hamilton failed to show that counsel's performance was constitutionally deficient or prejudicial in any way, including alleged failure to investigate and impeach witnesses, improper use of an expert, informing the jury during opening statements that Hamilton would testify when Hamilton decided not to testify, allowing an investigating officer to testify about interview techniques, and perceived adverse effects of counsel's alleged alcohol and drug use. Dismissal of Hamilton's petition was affirmed. Hamilton v. St., 2010 MT 25, 355 Mont. 133, 226 P.3d 588. See also Heath v. St., 2009 MT 7, 348 Mont. 361, 202 P.3d 118.

Death of Attorney Prior to Filing Response to Petition for Postconviction Relief — Unique Circumstance Warranting Evidentiary Hearing: Heath filed a timely petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court ordered the attorney to respond to the charges, but before a response was filed, the attorney died. Heath then requested an evidentiary hearing, but the request for a hearing was denied on grounds that the court failed to see the benefit of a hearing without the attorney in attendance, and the petition was denied without holding a hearing. Heath appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Although not all circumstances require the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing on a petition for postconviction relief, a hearing may be appropriate in certain settings with unique circumstances. The attorney's death prior to filing a court-ordered response constituted one of those unique circumstances. The record failed to set forth the attorney's reasons for pretrial and trial actions, and denial of a hearing left Heath without any alternative means of inquiry into the attorney's actions and whether those decisions supported Heath's ineffective assistance claims. Therefore, under these unique circumstances the Supreme Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing to provide Heath a reasonable alternative means to inquire into the attorney's reasons for the pretrial and trial actions and to allow the District Court to evaluate Heath's claims. Heath v. St., 2009 MT 7, 348 M 361, 202 P3d 118 (2009). See also Williams v. St., 2002 MT 189, 311 M 108, 53 P3d 864 (2002), and Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Charge That Defense Counsel Failed to Adequately Investigate and Rehabilitate Witness With Prior Consistent Statement — Objective Standard of Reasonableness Applied: Postconviction relief was denied after Deschon contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel at trial because his court-appointed attorneys failed to investigate the violent history of Deschon's stabbing victim and did not attempt to rehabilitate a witness with a prior consistent statement. The Supreme Court found that investigation of the victim's history would have produced no admissible evidence because there was nothing indicating that Deschon stabbed the victim based on alleged incidents of the victim's violent past. Further, counsel believed that the witness was credible and that calling another witness to rehabilitate the witness with a prior consistent statement was not significant because the point that the victim was drunk was otherwise established. Counsel's actions fell within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance and sound trial strategy. Deschon failed to show that counsel's conduct was unreasonable, and having failed the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance, Deschon's petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Deschon v. St., 2008 MT 380, 347 M 30, 197 P3d 476 (2008). See also Longjaw v. St., 2012 MT 243, 366 Mont. 472, 288 P.3d 210.

No Evidence of Prejudicial State Involvement in Parole Proceedings — Postconviction Petition Properly Denied: As part of a plea agreement, the state agreed to not involve itself in Maldonado's parole proceedings. Maldonado contended that the state breached the plea agreement when the County Attorney sent a letter to the Board of Pardons and Parole recommending against Maldonado's parole. The District Court concluded that the state's action was harmless, and on appeal the Supreme Court agreed. Although the Board did receive the County Attorney's letter and one Board member met with a Deputy County Attorney, the state withdrew the letter of opposition, and the Board member who met with the Deputy County Attorney recused herself. Maldonado failed to present any evidence that the state's actions figured into the decision of the Board of Pardons and Parole or that Maldonado was prejudiced in any way, and the District Court did not err in denying Maldonado's request for postconviction relief on this issue. Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P3d 1043 (2008).

Appointment of Public Defender Prior to Filing of Petition for Postconviction Relief Prohibited: Section 46-8-104 provides that a District Court may order that counsel from the Office of State Public Defender represent an eligible person who has filed a postconviction action or proceeding under certain circumstances, but nothing in that section allows appointment of a public defender in advance of the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. Further, 47-1-104 does not give a District Court authority to appoint counsel employed by the public defender system to represent a person who may desire to file a petition for postconviction relief but who has not done so. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. District Court, 2007 MT 333, 340 M 234, 178 P3d 693 (2007).

Sentencing Judge to Preside Over Postconviction Proceedings: A District Court judge was substituted for the original judge early in Jordan's criminal proceedings and ultimately sentenced Jordan. When Jordan petitioned for postconviction relief, the original judge handled the proceedings and dismissed Jordan's petition. The Supreme Court held that the sentencing judge should preside over postconviction proceedings. Substitution of a trial judge does not suddenly evaporate in subsequent postconviction proceedings involving the same parties, witnesses, and factual background as the underlying case from which a judge was previously removed. In this case, the original judge's substitution in Jordan's criminal action also prevented the original judge from presiding over Jordan's postconviction proceedings. The postconviction claim was remanded for consideration by the sentencing judge. Jordan v. St., 2007 MT 165, 338 M 113, 162 P3d 863 (2007), following Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624 (1981).

Dismissal of Postconviction Petition for Failure to State Claim — Differentiation of Standards Applicable to Civil Cases — No Error in Failure to Hold Evidentiary Hearing on Postconviction Petition: Herman asserted that an evidentiary hearing should have been held regarding his petition for postconviction relief because the standard in this section is nearly identical to the provision in former Rule 12(b)(6), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), so allegations in a petition for postconviction relief must be taken as true and construed in a light most favorable to the petitioner, requiring a hearing on the allegations. The Supreme Court disagreed. The express statutory requirements in 46-21-104 significantly exceed and are inconsistent with the mere notice pleading requirements for an ordinary complaint in a civil action. Thus, the civil standards do not apply to dismissals of petitions for postconviction relief for failure to state a claim because the civil standards are inconsistent with the more specific requirements of 46-21-104 and this section, and the District Court did not err in failing to hold an evidentiary hearing on Herman's petition and in dismissing Herman's claim for failure to meet the procedural threshold in 46-21-104. Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006), following Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), and distinguishing St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), and St. v. Lawrence, 2001 MT 299, 307 M 487, 38 P3d 809 (2001).

Waiver of Right to Postconviction Challenge of Matters Occurring Prior to Guilty Plea and Unrelated to Nature of Plea: In a petition for postconviction relief, Herman raised numerous issues related to ineffective assistance of counsel that allegedly led to a guilty plea. However, by pleading guilty, Herman waived the right to challenge matters that occurred prior to the plea and that were unrelated to the voluntary or knowing nature of the plea or to the ineffective assistance claim, including: (1) a claim that Herman conducted, sought, or obtained independent legal research; (2) an assertion that Herman met the attachments requirement of 46-21-104(1)(c); (3) Herman's claim that he pleaded guilty because of the duress of incarceration; (4) counsel's failure to move for a bond reduction or pretrial release; and (5) a claim that counsel was ineffective by asserting a speedy trial violation. Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006), following Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004).

Counsel's Failure to Interview and Call Witnesses Within Range of Reasonable and Sound Professional Decisions — Failure to Prove Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Weaver contended that his defense counsel was ineffective in failing to interview and call certain witnesses and in not introducing an entomologist's report that might have created a reasonable doubt as to Weaver's role in a homicide. Under the first prong of the Strickland test, Weaver needed to overcome the strong presumption that counsel's defense strategies and trial tactics fell within a wide range of reasonable and sound professional decisions. The Supreme Court examined each of Weaver's contentions and determined that: (1) counsel's decision not to investigate potential witnesses did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness; (2) Weaver failed to meet the burden of showing that counsel's failure to interview potential witnesses constituted ineffective assistance to the extent that it resulted in prejudice raising a reasonable probability that the trial outcome would have been different; (3) counsel's decision not to call every witness that Weaver identified actually carried fewer risks and promoted Weaver's best interest at trial; and (4) failure to introduce the entomologist's report was tactical and the result of a conscientious, weighed decision made after consultation with Weaver and thus was not erroneous. Weaver's ineffective assistance claim failed. Weaver v. St., 2005 MT 158, 327 M 441, 114 P3d 1039 (2005), following Clausell v. St., 2005 MT 33, 326 M 63, 106 P3d 1175 (2005).

No Continuing District Court Jurisdiction to Review Original Sentence and Resentence on Original Charge: Evert was sentenced to 65 years in prison with 15 years suspended for sexual assault. About 5 years into the sentence, Evert petitioned pro se for postconviction relief, alleging numerous claims related to his guilty plea and sentencing, but no hearing was held. Following appointment of two different public defenders, the District Court was notified that the parties had reached an agreement on Evert's petition. In exchange for a new sentence, Evert agreed to withdraw the petition, waive the right to appeal the amended sentence, and waive the right to file any further postconviction petitions based on the new sentence. The District Court agreed to the stipulation, noted Evert's criminal history and progress in prison, and resentenced Evert to 60 years with 20 years suspended, with credit for time served. Evert then appealed the new sentence on grounds that the District Court mistakenly described Evert's eligibility for parole and that because the court did not correctly advise him, he did not fully understand the consequences of waiving his postconviction claims. The Supreme Court reversed because the District Court did not have continuing jurisdiction to resentence Evert after final judgment. Under 46-18-117, the District Court could modify or correct an erroneous sentence but had no authority to resentence Evert on the original charge. Therefore, Evert's original sentence was reinstated, the postconviction claims that Evert waived were also reinstated, and the case was remanded for consideration of the postconviction claims. St. v. Evert, 2004 MT 178, 322 M 105, 93 P3d 1254 (2004), following Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002), and Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003).

No Prejudice From Counsel's Failure to Notify Defendant of Minimum Sentence — Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Not Justifying Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied as Matter of Law: In a petition for postconviction relief, Cobell asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not inform him of the minimum 5-year imprisonment penalty for possession of a deadly weapon by a prisoner when Cobell entered a plea agreement wherein the state would recommend the minimum sentence in exchange for Cobell's guilty plea. The District Court summarily dismissed the petition, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The information charging Cobell informed him of the penalty, and Cobell accepted the plea agreement understanding that the sentencing court was free to reject the agreement and impose any appropriate sentence. Given the uncertainty in the agreement and the fact that Cobell received the benefit of the plea bargain, Cobell failed to show that he was prejudiced by counsel's alleged error. Absent a showing of prejudice, the District Court did not err in dismissing Cobell's petition for postconviction relief as a matter of law. St. v. Cobell, 2004 MT 46, 320 M 122, 86 P3d 20 (2004), followed in Lout v. St., 2005 MT 93, 326 M 485, 111 P3d 199 (2005).

Evidentiary Hearing on Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Required: A District Court may dismiss a petition for postconviction relief based solely on the files and records of the case. An evidentiary hearing is not required, nor are unsupported allegations sufficient to entitle a petitioner to a postconviction evidentiary hearing. Griffin v. St., 2003 MT 267, 317 M 457, 77 P3d 545 (2003). See also Notti v. St., 2008 MT 20, 341 M 183, 176 P3d 1040 (2008).

Failure to State Claim or Present Facts Justifying Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied: Griffin petitioned for postconviction relief, asserting claims of prosecutorial misconduct, double jeopardy, judicial bias, and ineffective assistance of counsel. However, a petitioner has the burden of showing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that facts justify the relief. Here, Griffin failed to bolster the claims with supporting evidence, such as affidavits, records, or other evidence. Thus, the petition failed to meet the statutory requirements or state a claim for relief and was properly dismissed as a matter of law. Griffin v. St., 2003 MT 267, 317 M 457, 77 P3d 545 (2003).

Standard of Review of Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief: The correct standard of review of a District Court's denial of a petition for postconviction relief is whether the court's findings of fact are clearly erroneous and whether its conclusions of law are correct. A different standard of review, namely whether substantial evidence supports the findings and conclusions of the District Court, as set out in St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182 (1990), Walker v. St., 261 M 1, 862 P2d 1 (1993), St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145 (1996), and similar cases, is overruled. Porter v. St., 2002 MT 319, 313 M 149, 60 P3d 951 (2002), following St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Failure of District Court to Review Entire Record on Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Violative of Due Process When Same Judge Presided at Trial: When considering Hagen's petition for postconviction relief, the District Court did not review the entire trial proceedings before making its conclusions of law. Hagen contended that failure to review the entire record deprived him of due process and resulted in erroneous findings and conclusions. A fundamental requirement of due process is the opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner; however, due process is a flexible concept that calls for such procedural protections as a particular situation demands. There is nothing in the postconviction relief statutes that explicitly requires that a District Court review the entire record, and the Supreme Court declined to impose a duty on District Courts to review the entire record in every situation. Rather, the scope of the duty is determined on a case-by-case basis. In this case, the District Court Judge who presided over the postconviction hearing was the same judge who presided at trial, so the duty to review relevant portions of the record at issue in the postconviction proceedings did not extend to the entire record because the same judge heard the trial testimony when it was presented. St. v. Hagen, 2002 MT 190, 311 M 117, 53 P3d 885 (2002).

Claim That Guilty Plea to Deliberate Homicide Influenced by Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Conviction Affirmed: Thee was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to 100 years in prison. In a petition for postconviction relief, Thee contended that he was denied effective assistance of counsel prior to and during a change of plea hearing when defense counsel: (1) induced Thee to plead guilty by threatening Thee that he was going to die unless he pleaded guilty; (2) failed to address the alleged violent treatment that Thee received from inmates and guards during Thee's incarceration in the county jail; (3) failed to seek suppression of statements that Thee made during police interrogation that allegedly violated Thee's Miranda rights; (4) failed to have Thee's mental or emotional stress at the time of the homicide evaluated by a qualified mental health examiner to prove circumstances that could be used to mitigate the deliberate homicide charge; and (5) failed to inform Thee of a possibility of seeking conviction on a lesser included offense. The Supreme Court examined each claim in light of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel. First, defense counsel has a duty to inform a client of the elements of an offense, the possible punishment, and the advisability of a plea agreement. Discussion of a death penalty between an attorney and client in a capital case may well invoke extreme anxiety, but nevertheless relates directly, albeit painfully, to the genuine circumstances of the client. Counsel's reported statements to Thee regarding the possibility of a death sentence were within the wide range of reasonable and sound professional assistance of a competent attorney counseling a client facing capital punishment. Second, counsel investigated Thee's allegations of violence in the county jail, prepared a report of the findings, discussed the findings with Thee, and brought the matter to the attention of the appropriate authorities. Counsel's actions stemmed from informed professional deliberation rather than neglect or ignorance, and precluded a finding of deficient performance for failure to investigate Thee's allegations of physical assault. Third, counsel investigated all statements made by Thee to police investigators, conferred with Thee, and researched the legal bases for possible suppression of certain statements. Counsel's strategic choices made after thorough investigation of the law and facts relevant to plausible options were virtually unchallengeable, and the fact that counsel reached a legal conclusion on an evidentiary challenge contrary to Thee's hopes provided no ground for finding deficient attorney performance. Fourth, despite Thee's claim to the contrary, counsel did seek and obtain a court-ordered mental health evaluation for Thee, and took the unequivocal findings from the evaluation into account when advising Thee to accept the plea agreement. Finally, counsel had no duty to inform Thee about the possibility of a lesser included offense, because neither mitigated deliberate homicide nor negligent homicide is an included offense of deliberate homicide, so the possibility of conviction on a lesser included offense did not legally exist. The trial court's denial of Thee's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. St. v. Thee, 2001 MT 294, 307 M 450, 37 P3d 741 (2001).

Issue of Counsel's Effective Use of Peremptory Juror Challenges More Appropriate When Raised as Petition for Postconviction Relief Rather Than on Direct Appeal When Record Silent: Russell was convicted of attempted deliberate homicide and appealed claiming ineffective assistance of counsel during jury selection. Russell contended that counsel failed to challenge for cause a relative of the victim and used two peremptory challenges to strike jurors who were outside the jury pool. Under the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel, challenged actions of counsel are presumed to be matters of trial strategy and a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel rendered adequate assistance and made all significant decisions in the exercise of reasonable professional judgment. Pursuant to St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), when the record does not illuminate the basis for the challenged acts or omissions of counsel, a claim of ineffective assistance is more appropriately raised in a petition for postconviction relief so that a supplemental record may be made. Here, the record was silent as to why Russell's counsel acted or failed to act regarding the juror challenges. Thus, the Supreme Court declined to discuss the issue on direct appeal. St. v. Russell, 2001 MT 278, 307 M 322, 37 P3d 678 (2001).

Record-Based or Nonrecord-Based Information Determinative of Appropriateness of Direct Appeal or Petition for Postconviction Relief — Direct Appeal Dismissed When Record Insufficient to Substantiate Effectiveness of Counsel: In 1999, White moved for an evidentiary hearing to allow the development of facts that were not part of the record but that were necessary to sustain a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court declared by order that a petition for postconviction relief would be the proper avenue for White's nonrecord-based ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Nevertheless, in late 2000, White appealed, contending that the claim of prejudicial error resulting from her trial counsel's various failures to provide representation, such as the failure to call witnesses, make an opening statement, or offer a theory of the case at any stage of the proceedings, was supported by the record and proper for direct appeal. The general rule set out in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), is that when ineffective assistance claims are based on facts of record, they must be raised on direct appeal, while claims based on allegations not documented in the record must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. The underlying principle of the rule is that a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance. The two distinct classifications of on-record and off-record actions tend to overlap at times, and though not easily distilled into a formula, the definitive question that decides whether actions are on-record or off-record is whether the record fully explains why counsel took the particular course of action. Generally, an alleged failure to object to the introduction of evidence, to the testimony of a witness, or to prosecutorial misconduct at trial is considered record-based and appropriate for direct appeal. Likewise, counsel's own conduct in presenting the case, such as improperly eliciting damaging testimony from a witness or rendering an improper opening statement or closing argument, may be pointed to as record-based. Decisions regarding the timing and number of objections and whether to offer no opening statement at all lie within counsel's tactical discretion, indicating that nonrecord-based information explaining the tactic may be involved. Similarly, counsel's failure to adequately investigate, to prepare a defense, to become familiar with critical areas of the applicable law, to offer a particular jury instruction, to object to the trial court's failure to consider sentencing alternatives, to object to the admission of evidence that is evidenced by the record, or to fully inform defendant of the consequences of various options and rights, even though the prejudicial results of the ineffectiveness appear on the record, may constitute a nonrecord-based claim. In White's case, the record supplied some indicia of why a certain objection was raised at a particular time, but was still insufficient to determine to what extent counsel's actions were purely tactical or resulted from deficient representation. Thus, the information was considered nonrecord-based and should have been raised by petition for postconviction relief, so White's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice. St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Earl, 2003 MT 158, 316 M 263, 71 P3d 1201 (2003), St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), St. v. Notti, 2003 MT 296, 318 M 146, 79 P3d 289 (2003), St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003), St. v. Bowser, 2005 MT 279, 329 M 218, 123 P3d 230 (2005), St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005), Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006), St. v. Worthan, 2006 MT 147, 332 M 401, 138 P3d 805 (2006), St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003), St. v. Adgerson, 2003 MT 284, 318 M 22, 78 P3d 850 (2003), and St. v. Davis, 2003 MT 341, 318 M 459, 81 P3d 484 (2003). See also St. v. St. Germain, 2007 MT 28, 336 M 17, 153 P3d 591 (2007), in which the Supreme Court declined to address a direct appeal of defense counsel's nonrecord-based reasons for making a double jeopardy argument and for failing to call a witness to testify in an incest case because the issues were appropriate for postconviction proceedings. See also St. v. Green, 2009 MT 114, 350 M 141, 205 P3d 798 (2009), in which an ineffective counsel appeal based on counsel's failure to request an accomplice instruction in a homicide trial was dismissed in favor of postconviction relief proceedings because plausible justifications existed for counsel's conduct that could not be addressed on appeal since the record did not resolve the factual questions surrounding counsel's actions.

Summary Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief — Defendant Entitled to Hearing to Present Nonrecord-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims: Schaff was convicted of deliberate homicide and filed a petition for postconviction relief, contending that he received ineffective assistance of counsel when forced to decide whether to accept a plea agreement after considering the matter for less than 2 hours. He claimed that with the assistance of different counsel at the hearing to withdraw the guilty plea, he could have established that the plea was not voluntary. Schaff further argued that he could not have raised the precise issue of ineffective assistance because discussions between his attorney and him were not record-based and thus could be presented only through a petition for postconviction relief. The state argued that the petition was defective because Schaff did not sufficiently specify the claim of ineffective assistance, offered no supporting information, and did not identify precisely why counsel was ineffective.

The state also pointed out that Schaff had previously raised the issue of voluntariness in St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682 (1998), and that the issue had been decided and was barred from being raised again by the doctrine of res judicata. The Supreme Court disagreed that the voluntariness of Schaff's plea was not a proper subject for a postconviction proceeding. Although the issue of voluntariness was previously raised, Schaff did not raise the precise question of whether he had received competent advice prior to entering a plea or the question of whether he was misled to believe that he was required to proceed with the change of plea hearing with trial counsel when he was legally entitled to be represented by other counsel. The question of whether Schaff was properly advised necessarily touched on the voluntariness of the plea but was separate from it and was not part of the record in the direct appeal, nor was it the type of evidence that Schaff would be likely to present at a change of plea hearing. Rather than summarily dismiss Schaff's petition, the better course would have been for the District Court to appoint Schaff counsel and provide an opportunity for a hearing to present the ineffective assistance claims. Thus, the Supreme Court affirmed the part of the District Court's order with regard to any record-based voluntariness claims that had already been addressed by direct appeal, but reversed that part of the order that held that Schaff was procedurally barred from raising the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel in the nonrecord-based postconviction proceeding. St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001). Following hearing on remand, the District Court again denied Schaff's petition for postconviction relief, and Schaff appealed on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Applying the Strickland test, the Supreme Court found that Schaff proved neither that counsel's assistance was deficient nor that counsel's performance was prejudicial to Schaff's case. An ineffective assistance claim must be grounded on facts in the record rather than on mere conclusory allegations. Schaff's claim was not supported by the record, so the petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Schaff v. St., 2003 MT 187, 316 M 453, 73 P3d 806 (2003). See also Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), and Chyatte v. St., 2015 MT 343, 381 Mont. 534, 362 P.3d 854.

Appointment of Counsel for Indigent Defendant in Postconviction Proceeding Required — No Duty on Defendant to Notify Court of "Desire" for Counsel: Notwithstanding the apparent conflict between 46-8-104, which grants the court discretion to assign counsel if an indigent defendant "desires" counsel, and this section, which makes assignment of counsel mandatory if a postconviction hearing is required and the defendant is indigent, neither statute requires that a defendant give the court notice of the defendant's desire for counsel. Under this section, the court must inquire into the indigence status of the defendant and determine if the defendant is indigent and qualifies for appointed counsel under Title 46, ch. 8, part 1. If the defendant qualifies, the court must appoint counsel to represent the defendant on the postconviction petition. Swearingen v. St., 2001 MT 10, 304 M 97, 18 P3d 998 (2001).

Admission of Victim Impact Evidence at Resentencing Hearing — No Error: The District Court did not err in admitting victim impact evidence during the resentencing hearing when petitioner was informed of the information that the state planned to present and was provided with ample opportunity to respond to that information. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Presence of Victim's Family and Media at Resentencing Hearing Not Grounds for Change of Venue: The presence of the victim's family and supporters and local media is not reasonable grounds for believing that prejudice in the form of an air of hostility actually existed at the resentencing hearing. The District Court did not err in denying a motion for a change of venue. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Civil Procedure Rule That Notice of Entry of Order Be Served by Prevailing Party Inapplicable in Postconviction Relief Proceeding: In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court addressed whether the notice of entry of judgment requirement under former Rule 77(d), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), applied to postconviction relief proceedings governed by Title 46, ch. 21. The court previously held in cases unrelated to postconviction proceedings that only when the notice is served does a prospective appellant's time for filing a notice of appeal begin to run. (See In re Marriage of Robertson, 237 M 406, 773 P2d 1213 (1989), Buckley v. Wordal, 262 M 306, 865 P2d 240, 50 St. Rep. 1570 (1993), and Trogia v. Bartoletti, 266 M 240, 879 P2d 1169, 51 St. Rep. 783 (1994).) Here, Garner was convicted of forgery and felony theft and contended that because the state was the "prevailing party", notice should have been provided to him of the entry of the District Court's order and that because notice was not provided, the 60 days within which to appeal could not have expired because it never commenced to run. However, the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure apply in a postconviction relief proceeding only when they are applicable and not inconsistent with postconviction statutes. Section 46-21-203 specifically requires that an appeal in postconviction proceedings be taken within 60 days of the entry of the order, which is inconsistent with the general notice rule in former Rule 77(d). The Supreme Court applied the particular provision over the general provision and concluded that former Rule 77(d) has no application in postconviction relief proceedings, so the 60-day filing deadline in 46-21-203 commences in all instances and without more upon entry of the court's order granting or denying postconviction relief. St. v. Garner, 1999 MT 295, 297 M 89, 990 P2d 175, 56 St. Rep. 1180 (1999).

Standard of Review of Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief: The Supreme Court reviews the denial of a petition for postconviction relief to determine whether the District Court's findings are clearly erroneous and whether its conclusions of law are correct. Bauer v. St., 1999 MT 185, 295 M 306, 983 P2d 955, 56 St. Rep. 715 (1999), citing Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734 (1997).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Denied — No Due Process Violation — No Abuse of Discretion in Refusing New Trial Because All Factors Not Fulfilled — No New Trial: Sullivan, the director of the Parks and Recreation Department for the city of Great Falls, was convicted of three counts of felony theft of various city recreational fees and one count of tampering with public records. Later, the employee who replaced him found in a budget file an envelope containing $1,300 of city recreation funds. Sullivan brought a petition for postconviction relief, arguing that his constitutional rights under Brady v. Md., 373 US 83 (1963) (granting postconviction relief on the basis of evidence suppressed by the prosecution), had been violated and that the newly discovered evidence entitled him to a new trial. The Supreme Court held Brady inapplicable because the new evidence was not known to the prosecution at the time of the trial and therefore could not have been wrongfully withheld. In connection with the Brady claim, the Supreme Court also noted that Sullivan had not attached an affidavit or other evidence in support of his allegations, as required by 46-21-104, and concluded that Sullivan's assertions were not sufficient under this section to allow him to conduct discovery or to entitle him to an evidentiary hearing. Because theft is not an element of tampering under 45-7-208 and 45-2-302, the Supreme Court concluded that Sullivan's conviction for tampering by making another employee alter official city records would not have been changed had the newly discovered evidence been available at trial. The Supreme Court also concluded that Sullivan had not fulfilled all of the six factors discussed in St. v. Cline, 275 M 46, 909 P2d 1171 (1996), required for grant of a new trial based upon newly discovered evidence because he had not shown that the new evidence would probably produce a different result at trial and that the new evidence was not merely cumulative evidence. Concerning Sullivan's final claim, the Supreme Court noted that in St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988), the defendant obtained newly discovered evidence but that neither a motion for a new trial nor postconviction relief was available to the defendant, so the Supreme Court created a "window" for review of the claim that otherwise would have been procedurally barred. The Supreme Court contrasted Perry and pointed out that in Sullivan's case, he was not barred from bringing a petition for postconviction relief. For all of these reasons, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's denial for postconviction relief and denial of Sullivan's motion for a new trial. St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Stiffening of Sentence by Sentence Review Division That Found Original Sentence Not Inadequate: Offender pleaded guilty to aggravated assault and was sentenced to 20 years in the state prison. The Sentence Review Division found that the sentence was not inadequate or excessive, but modified the sentence to provide for no parole until 7 years had been served and to require completion of the prison's anger management program and other counseling considered appropriate by the staff. The Division stated that the modification was made because during the sentence review hearing, offender showed no remorse or concern for the victim, showed disdain for the victim, and accepted no responsibility for his actions. On petition for postconviction relief, the court held that having found that the original sentence was not inadequate, the Sentence Review Division lacked jurisdiction to alter the sentence. The court struck the modification from the sentence. St. v. Torres, 277 M 514, 922 P2d 1180, 53 St. Rep. 826 (1996).

Failure to Appoint New Counsel During Posttrial Hearing on Counsel's Effectiveness: Finley contended that the District Court denied him his right to counsel's undivided loyalty under this section by failing to appoint new counsel to represent him at a posttrial hearing regarding his counsel's effectiveness, at which his counsel confronted him concerning the sufficiency of his allegations of ineffectiveness and then took the stand to rebut those allegations. This section was not in effect at the time of the hearing and thus did not apply; however, under 46-21-101, a postconviction hearing is a separate proceeding that is available after sentencing and applies when there is no adequate remedy of appeal. Further, under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., the right to counsel is composed of two correlative rights—the right to counsel of reasonable competence and the right to counsel's undivided loyalty. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Zackuse, 250 M 385, 833 P2d 142 (1991), in holding that when a defendant and counsel have a conflict so great that it results in a total lack of communication or that if counsel fails to render effective assistance, new counsel should be appointed. The potential for substantial prejudice to Finley existed at the posttrial hearing, qualifying the hearing as a critical stage in the proceedings. It was error for the trial court to fail to appoint new counsel, at least for purposes of the competency hearing. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996).

Petitioner Not Entitled to Relief — Responsive Pleading and Evidentiary Hearing Not Required: Unless a petitioner is entitled to relief, a responsive pleading and evidentiary hearing are not required under this section. Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992), following Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624 (1981), and followed in St. v. Cobell, 2004 MT 46, 320 M 122, 86 P3d 20 (2004).

Defendant Granted Evidentiary Hearing — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The District Court granted defendant a hearing as outlined in this section and received evidence in the form of oral testimony and exhibits in which defendant presented proof regarding his allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel. Nothing in the record supports defendant's contention that such an evidentiary hearing was not held. St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182, 47 St. Rep. 328 (1990).

Affidavit Procedure Not Violative of Fair Hearing: Defendant contended the District Court procedure for accepting or not accepting affidavits and sworn statements constituted reversible error. The Supreme Court decided defendant had a full and fair hearing in light of the fact that he: (1) was adequately represented; (2) was provided a court reporter at no expense; (3) was given proper notice; (4) was allowed to present and confront witnesses; (5) personally appeared, testified, and had his exhibits admitted into evidence; (6) sought no continuance and presented no evidence following notice of affidavit; and (7) had prior statements properly considered. St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268, 45 St. Rep. 1192 (1988).

Impartial Jury — Prejudice Not Presumed: Petitioner alleged that he was denied his right to a trial by a fair and impartial jury in that much publicity surrounded his case, and his first conviction was overturned. The District Judge reviewed the transcript of voir dire and determined that the publicity had no prejudicial effect. The jurors were questioned as a whole, and many individually, as to their attitudes resulting from the trial's publicity. The apparent result of the questioning was that nearly all jurors had heard of the case, but all agreed that they could decide the case on the evidence presented. No specific instance of a prejudiced juror was shown. The court will not presume prejudice. It is incumbent on the petitioner to present specific evidence of prejudice to the court. Judges will not "pierce the veil of jury deliberations" to try to find whether the decision was based on bias and prejudice. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Omissions of Counsel — Evidentiary Hearing Required: In his petition for postconviction relief, petitioner asserted that he was denied effective assistance of counsel. Many of the errors complained of involved failure to act and omissions rather than commissions. A mere review of the record cannot show that petitioner was entitled to no relief. He is entitled to an evidentiary hearing on this issue. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981), followed in Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), and distinguished in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Two-Judge Disqualification Unavailable to Postconviction Petitioner: Although a postconviction petition filed under the provisions of Title 46, ch. 21, is civil in nature, the petitioner is not entitled to two substitutions of presiding judges as allowed in 3-1-801 (now replaced by 3-1-802). An applicant for postconviction relief is directed by the more specific provisions of the postconviction statute to bring the petition in the Supreme Court or in the court that sentenced him. A specific statute controls over a general statute. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Burden of Petitioner: The burden of the petitioner when requesting postconviction relief is to show by a preponderance of evidence that the facts justify the relief. Yother v. St., 182 M 351, 597 P2d 79 (1979), following In re Jones, 176 M 412, 578 P2d 1150 (1978). See also St. v. Peck, 263 M 1, 865 P2d 304, 50 St. Rep. 1692 (1993).

Sufficiency of Factual Evidence to Justify Sentence: It was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion to sentence the defendant within the statutory limits when the court relied on an accumulation of different reports as to the condition of the assault victim. St. v. Mann, 169 M 306, 546 P2d 515 (1976).

Mistrial — Claim of Double Jeopardy: After a motion for a mistrial was granted, the defendant's petition to the Supreme Court for dismissal of the subsequent trial on the ground of double jeopardy was dismissed, since the defendant had not yet been adjudged guilty of any offense. State ex rel. LaFlesch v. District Court, 165 M 302, 529 P2d 1403 (1974).

This section is essential so that a federal court is able to readily determine if it should accept and make an independent determination in case a petitioner files a claim for relief in that court. A sufficient state court record is referred to by the U.S. Supreme Court as "indispensable in determining whether the habeas applicant received a full and fair state court evidentiary hearing resulting in reliable findings." Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293.

Without adequate recordation of a state court proceeding the federal courts will assume that the applicant did not receive a fair and adequate proceeding, or that its findings were not reliable and the federal court will accept the claim for relief and make an independent determination. As a result, it is suggested that a court reporter be present, so that if a full record is needed it will be available.

Case Notes

Time Attributable to Institutional Delays Not Speedy Trial Violation — Defendant Did Not Show Prejudice: The defendant was charged with several felonies related to an attempted robbery. The defendant subsequently substituted her attorneys on two separate occasions and requested to substitute her third attorney before withdrawing the request. The defendant's motion to dismiss the charges for lack of speedy trial was denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that of the 375 days of delay, 14 were attributable to the defendant. However, the Supreme Court also held that the District Court correctly determined that the defendant acquiesced in the delays caused by her requests for different attorneys, that the defendant did not show any actual prejudice in her pretrial incarceration, that the vast amount of delay was due to institutional delay, and in the absence of an evidentiary foundation there was no basis for finding undue prejudice to the defendant or that her counsel was ineffective. St. v. Llamas, 2017 MT 155, 388 Mont. 53, 402 P.3d 611.

Failure to Adequately Address Newly Discovered Evidence Claim: The District Court failed to adequately address the defendant's newly discovered evidence claim when it made no specific conclusions regarding the claim and did not identify the legal standard required for the defendant to succeed on the claim. Therefore, on appeal, the Supreme Court remanded the defendant's newly discovered evidence claim to the District Court to apply the standard stated in 46-21-102 and independently consider and rule on the claim. Wilkes v. St., 2015 MT 243, 380 Mont. 388, 355 P.3d 755.

The purpose of this section is threefold: first, it is desirable to provide a method of review of alleged errors in the lower court; second, a method of review appears to be necessary because of the finality of the judgment in the lower court; and third, the interests of justice require that both petitioner and the state be given the rights of review.

This section specifies the period within which, after a final order is rendered, an appeal must be brought. This section sets out a special procedure as to time of review (60 days) which is different from the normal appeal. The reason for this is that in most instances a person who may seek review under this Act will be incarcerated at the time he enters his petition. Individuals so situated often have difficulties in getting their papers in order and in inducing clerks to act promptly on their petitions. For these reasons a longer period of review is provided for under this Act. Other than the time element, an appeal taken under this chapter shall be in conformance with chapter [20] of this code.

Case Notes

Only Record-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim on Appeal: Frasure claimed on appeal that her attorney provided ineffective assistance at trial by failing to object to the introduction of certain evidence. However, the Supreme Court will determine that there was ineffective assistance of counsel only if that conclusion can be based on the record on appeal or if there is no plausible justification for counsel's actions or inactions. Frasure failed to establish that her ineffective assistance claim was record-based, so the claim was dismissed without prejudice to the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 305, 323 M 479, 100 P3d 1013 (2004). See also St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003), St. v. Baker, 2013 MT 113, 370 Mont. 43, 300 P.3d 696, *St. v. Standard of Review of Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief: The correct standard of review of a District Court's denial of a petition for postconviction relief is whether the court's findings of fact are clearly erroneous and whether its conclusions of law are correct. A different standard of review, namely whether substantial evidence supports the findings and conclusions of the District Court, as set out in St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182 (1990), Walker v. St., 261 M 1, 862 P2d 1 (1993), St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145 (1996), and similar cases, is overruled. Porter v. St., 2002 MT 319, 313 M 149, 60 P3d 951 (2002), following St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

No Ineffective Assistance Based on Defense Counsel's Personal Problems — Remand for Consideration of Issues in Amended Petition for Postconviction Relief: In an original petition for postconviction relief, Williams raised five issues of ineffective assistance of counsel, asserting that counsel: (1) failed to conduct proper discovery; (2) failed to obtain and call necessary witnesses at trial; (3) failed to properly question witnesses; (4) conducted inadequate trial preparation; and (5) allowed his personal problems to detract from his representation. The District Court allowed Williams to amend the petition to add two additional claims, contending that counsel failed to substitute the trial judge when requested to do so and failed to call necessary and beneficial witnesses at the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court's review of the record revealed that the District Court did not erroneously address any of the original five claims, including the assertion that defense counsel's overall emotional state adversely affected Williams's representation. However, the record showed that the two issues added by Williams in the amended petition were never addressed, so the District Court's findings regarding those two material issues were insufficient. The case was remanded to allow further consideration of the additional claims. Williams v. St., 2002 MT 189, 311 M 108, 53 P3d 864 (2002).

Record Devoid of Pretrial Tactical Decisions — Evidentiary Hearing Required on Ineffective Assistance Claim: In St. v. Soraich, 1999 MT 87, 294 M 175, 979 P2d 206 (1999), the Supreme Court held that the prosecutor in Soraich's murder trial was entitled to comment on a theory suggested by defense counsel because the theory lacked evidentiary support and because the comments were plainly in response to defense counsel's opening statements. Soraich then filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming that defense counsel rendered ineffective assistance by stating that counsel would prove that the state's key witness gave inconsistent statements, without first determining whether an investigator's statement could be introduced as impeachment evidence. The District Court denied the petition, holding that Soraich should have raised the ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal because the claim was based on facts of record in the underlying case, so the claim was procedurally barred from postconviction review. To determine whether the ineffective assistance claim should have been raised on direct appeal or in a postconviction hearing, the Supreme Court cited the two-part process in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). First, the trial record must adequately document a challenged act or omission of defense counsel for the defendant to raise an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Second, the record on appeal must afford sufficient understanding of the reason for counsel's act or omission to answer the threshold question of whether the alleged error expresses a trial strategy or tactical decision, and if the record does not supply the reason for counsel's act or omission, the claim must be raised by postconviction relief. The record here did not contain any information about why defense counsel promised the jury that the investigator's testimony would prove Soraich's defense, but then failed to call the investigator as a witness. Without an evidentiary hearing and direct questioning of defense counsel, any guesses on what led to the failure to call the investigator as a witness were purely speculative. Because the record was devoid of counsel's pretrial tactical decisions, Soraich could not satisfy the second prong of the Strickland test, so 46-21-105 did not bar Soraich's postconviction assertion of ineffective assistance at trial. An evidentiary hearing was necessary to address the second prong of the Strickland test, and the District Court improperly dismissed Soraich's petition for postconviction relief. Therefore, the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the ineffective assistance claim. Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002). On remand, the District Court again denied relief, holding that under the second prong of the Strickland test, any allegedly deficient performance of counsel did not prejudice Soraich. Soraich appealed again, asserting that counsel's failure to call a witness to impeach a state witness resulted in prejudice. The Supreme Court disagreed. The witness had already been impeached through the testimony of another defense witness and by cross-examination concerning all of the inconsistencies in the questionable testimony. Failure to call another witness to establish the same point did not create a reasonable probability that the trial result would have been different and did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court was affirmed. Soraich v. St., 2004 MT 215, 322 M 375, 97 P3d 529 (2004). See also St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001).

Civil Procedure Rule That Notice of Entry of Order Be Served by Prevailing Party Inapplicable in Postconviction Relief Proceeding: In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court addressed whether the notice of entry of judgment requirement under former Rule 77(d), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), applied to postconviction relief proceedings governed by Title 46, ch. 21. The court previously held in cases unrelated to postconviction proceedings that only when the notice is served does a prospective appellant's time for filing a notice of appeal begin to run. (See In re Marriage of Robertson, 237 M 406, 773 P2d 1213 (1989), Buckley v. Wordal, 262 M 306, 865 P2d 240, 50 St. Rep. 1570 (1993), and Troglia v. Bartoletti, 266 M 240, 879 P2d 1169, 51 St. Rep. 783 (1994).) Here, Garner was convicted of forgery and felony theft and contended that because the state was the "prevailing party", notice should have been provided to him of the entry of the District Court's order and that because notice was not provided, the 60 days within which to appeal could not have expired because it never commenced to run. However, the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure apply in a postconviction relief proceeding only when they are applicable and not inconsistent with postconviction statutes. This section specifically requires that an appeal in postconviction proceedings be taken within 60 days of the entry of the order, which is inconsistent with the general notice rule in former Rule 77(d). The Supreme Court applied the particular provision over the general provision and concluded that former Rule 77(d) has no application in postconviction relief proceedings, so the 60-day filing deadline in this section commences in all instances and without more upon entry of the court's order granting or denying postconviction relief. St. v. Garner, 1999 MT 295, 297 M 89, 990 P2d 175, 56 St. Rep. 1180 (1999).

Out-of-Time Appeal Based on Claim of Ineffective Counsel Denied: An out-of-time appeal is a remedy that may be available to a defendant involved in a criminal proceeding who, through no fault of the defendant, misses a deadline for filing an appeal. Here, Garner moved for an out-of-time appeal on grounds of ineffective counsel. The trial court denied the motion after finding substantial factual evidence that Garner was fully advised of his right to appeal the postconviction relief order, as well as of the 60-day deadline for filing notice of appeal. The ineffective assistance argument was without merit, and the trial court was affirmed. St. v. Garner, 1999 MT 295, 297 M 89, 990 P2d 175, 56 St. Rep. 1180 (1999).

No Legal Duty to Provide Party Copies of Transcripts in Pending Matter: Walker petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus ordering the District Court to provide him with copies of the transcripts, minutes, and documents in his pending criminal case. The Supreme Court refused to issue the order on the basis that there was no clear legal duty requiring the District Court to provide the requested information and that Walker could appeal any final decision by the District Court. Walker v. Colberg, 250 M 382, 822 P2d 82, 48 St. Rep. 971 (1991).

CHAPTER 22 HABEAS CORPUS

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable

Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Chapter Case Notes

Denial of Bond Pending Appeal — Method of Supreme Court Review — Jurisdiction: After conviction for negligent homicide and on related charges, Ingraham moved the District Court to continue bond pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion, finding that Ingraham was a danger to the community and therefore did not meet the requirements of 46-9-107. Ingraham then moved the Supreme Court, pursuant to former Rule 22, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to continue bond pending appeal or, in the alternative, to accept appeal of the District Court's order denying bond, pursuant to former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and 46-20-104. The Attorney General moved to dismiss, contending that there was no provision in law for appeal from a District Court order denying bond pending appeal and that Ingraham should have brought an original habeas corpus proceeding. The Supreme Court agreed with the Attorney General and dismissed Ingraham's motion or appeal, holding that Ingraham should have brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 46-22-103. Ingraham then filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which was filed with Justice Trieweiler pursuant to 3-2-212. Justice Trieweiler granted the petition to the extent necessary for the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing as provided by statute, under the theory that the District Court was the more appropriate court for the hearing than was the Supreme Court. The Attorney General opposed the order by applying to the full Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, arguing, contrary to the state's previous position, that 46-22-103 does not really apply to persons convicted in a criminal case and that the more appropriate procedure was an original proceeding "in the nature of habeas corpus" before the full Supreme Court. The application for a writ of supervisory control was denied, was treated by the Supreme Court as a late-filed response to Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and was referred to Justice Trieweiler. Justice Trieweiler determined that it was inappropriate for him alone to determine the form of review of the District Court's denial of bond. Justice Trieweiler also determined that: (1) Ingraham had no constitutional right to bond pending appeal; (2) Ingraham did have a right to the proper exercise of the District Court's discretion in the application of 46-9-107; and (3) that right was a substantial right for the purposes of 46-20-104. For these reasons, Justice Trieweiler vacated his previous order granting Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and referred the matter to the full Supreme Court for review of the District Court's order denying bond pending appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Federal Habeas Corpus — New Evidence: The mere existence of newly discovered evidence does not constitute grounds for federal habeas corpus relief unless the evidence bears upon the constitutionality of the petitioner's detention. In finding that the evidence submitted did not warrant habeas corpus relief, the District Judge properly applied a standard of whether the new evidence would probably produce an acquittal. Quigg v. Crist, 616 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1980).

Dual Nature of Habeas Corpus — Appealability: Habeas corpus is a civil proceeding when involved in child custody and related cases. Decisions made by the courts in those actions are appealable and res judicata as to certain matters heard at the District Court level. Habeas corpus is a criminal proceeding when the action in which it is originally brought is criminal in nature, such as an extradition proceeding. In criminal actions, denial of the writ is not appealable but successive applications for the writ may be brought directly to the Supreme Court until the judicial power of the state has been exhausted. In re Hart, 178 M 235, 583 P2d 411 (1978).

GENERAL

Likelihood of Success on Appeal Not Factor in Determining Release of Defendant Pending Appeal: Ingraham argued that because at least one issue in his pending appeal created a strong likelihood that the Supreme Court would reverse his conviction, equity and fairness required that he be released on bond pending appeal. The Supreme Court held that the statute governing the availability of release on bond pending appeal does not refer to the likelihood of a successful appeal, and therefore such likelihood is not grounds for release on bond. Ingraham v. St., 284 M 481, 945 P2d 19, 54 St. Rep. 782 (1997).

Weighing Evidence to Determine Continuation of Bond Pending Appeal Within Trial Court's Discretion: Ingraham argued that the trial court abused its discretion in denying his motion that he be released on bond pending appeal. The Supreme Court held that it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to give greater weight to evidence indicating that the defendant would pose a threat to the community if released pending appeal than to evidence presented by the defendant indicating that he would not pose a threat. Ingraham v. St., 284 M 481, 945 P2d 19, 54 St. Rep. 782 (1997).

Sequence of Consecutive Sentences: When the petitioner was sentenced to serve consecutive sentences for escape and using an automobile without the consent of the owner and the warden executed the sentences in a sequence reverse to that indicated by the court, there was no infringement on his rights and his petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was denied. Petition of Cheadle, 143 M 327, 389 P2d 579 (1964).

Waiver of Certain Irregularities:

The result of an appeal from a judgment of a Justice of the Peace, in a prosecution for a misdemeanor, is to abrogate that judgment and to hold the defendant under the original warrant of arrest for a trial de novo in the District Court, and the defendant cannot complain, on habeas corpus, of any irregularity committed by the Justice in rendering the judgment. Hosoda v. Neville, 45 M 310, 123 P 20 (1912).

Since the District Court does not, on appeal from a Justice's Court, sit as a court of review but tries the case de novo, any irregularities attending the rendition of the judgment in a case in which the Justice had jurisdiction of the offense charged and of the defendant are waived by taking the appeal. St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907).

FEDERAL HABEAS CORPUS STANDARDS

Cognizable Claims — Review of Factfinding Below — Required Record: Where habeas corpus petitioner raised cognizable claims, the Federal District Court was required to review state factfinding proceedings before accepting the findings against petitioner, and the material before the District Court was insufficient to permit it to determine whether petitioner was accorded a full and fair hearing on his constitutional claims where the District Court had before it only excerpts of brief portions of the various state trial proceedings. Dismissal of the petition would be vacated and the cause remanded. Little Light v. Crist, 649 F2d 682 (9th Cir. 1981).

Required Considerations — When Evidentiary Hearing Mandatory: When considering a federal habeas corpus petition a federal district court must: (1) consider whether the allegations would establish a right to be released if proved; (2) decide whether any cognizable issues raised by the petition were accorded a full and fair hearing in the state trial court (if not, the District Court must hold an evidentiary hearing on them); and (3) independently apply federal law principles to the state factual findings. An evidentiary hearing is mandatory in any of the following instances: (1) the merits of the factual dispute were not resolved at the state hearing; (2) the state factual determination was not fairly supported by the record; (3) the state factfinding procedure did not afford a full and fair hearing; (4) there were substantial allegations of newly discovered evidence; (5) material facts were not adequately developed at the state hearing; and (6) it appears for any other reason that the state trier did not afford petitioner a full and fair fact hearing. Little Light v. Crist, 649 F2d 682 (9th Cir. 1981).

Unexhausted Issues Existing — Exhausted Issues Heard When Fairness Dictates: When considerations of fairness so dictate, a federal court may, in a habeas corpus proceeding, hear issues exhausted in the state courts even though unexhausted issues exist. Little Light v. Crist, 649 F2d 682 (9th Cir. 1981).

Failure to Give Advice and Explanation Prior to Guilty Plea — Hearing Required: When a state prisoner makes specific and detailed factual assertions which are improbable but cannot be called incredible, and the record shows that no preguilty plea explanation of the elements of the charge, and of possible defenses which his attorney or the court is aware of, was made to the prisoner, a hearing must be held on the question whether the guilty plea was voluntary in the sense of being intelligently made. If the State contends but cannot prove that an explanation of the plea was made in private, and the prisoner denies it, a hearing must be held. And a hearing must be held in federal courts if the state courts do not hold a hearing. Federal habeas corpus is appropriate in such instances. Sober v. Crist, 644 F2d 807 (9th Cir. 1981).

Incompetent Attorney Claim — Hearing Required: State prisoner who had pleaded guilty and was seeking federal habeas corpus should have been given a hearing in the District Court on his claim that his attorney was incompetent. Sober v. Crist, 644 F2d 807 (9th Cir. 1981).

FEDERAL HABEAS CORPUS DENIED

State Remedies for Prosecutor's Acts Exhausted — Comity and Judicial Restraint as Grounds for Denying Relief: Comity and judicial restraint required that, absent special circumstances warranting federal court intervention, District Court grant of pretrial petition for federal habeas corpus, brought by petitioners who had exhausted their state remedies, be reversed. Delay caused by prosecution's disqualification of judge for tactical purposes did not constitute special circumstances. Nor did a 19-count charge when six counts were sufficient, where any unfairness resulting therefrom was avoided by state courts' dismissal of the unnecessary counts. Carden v. Mont., 626 F2d 82 (9th Cir. 1980), certiorari denied, 449 US 1014, 66 L Ed 2d 473, 101 S Ct 573 (1980).

Exhaustion of State Remedies: Federal habeas corpus relief was denied where petitioner claiming constitutional violations failed to exhaust state remedies in accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 2254(b). Since a lack of state jurisdiction over the petitioner could also have been tested by state habeas corpus proceedings but was not, the habeas corpus complaint for lack of state jurisdiction was also denied. Campbell v. Crist, 36 St. Rep. 1690 (D.C. Mont. 1979) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement), affirmed in 647 F2d 956 (9th Cir. 1981).

Failure to Give Defendant's Offered Self-Defense Instruction: Failure of the court to give defendant's offered instruction on self-defense, when viewed with the instructions as a whole, did not render the trial so fundamentally unfair as to amount to a fundamental deprivation of due process that would support federal habeas corpus relief. United States ex rel. Collins v. Crist, 473 F. Supp. 1354 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

"Plain Error" Rule Not Invoked by Invalid Instruction: The instruction by the court that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary act, which was declared improper in Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979), was not objected to by the defendant, thus invoking the plain error test. The instruction did not go to the essence of the case, and it is not highly probable that the error materially affected the verdict. United States ex rel. Collins v. Crist, 473 F. Supp. 1354 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

Speedy Trial Claim: There was no fundamental deprivation of the federal constitutional right to a speedy trial that would support federal habeas corpus relief where a delay of 330 days, although substantial, was granted for the benefit of the defendant. United States ex rel. Collins v. Crist, 473 F. Supp. 1354 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

46-22-101. Applicability of writ of habeas corpus.

Commission Comments

Source: Oregon Revised Statutes 34.310 and 94-101-1, R.C.M. 1947.

This chapter has been narrowed in an attempt to limit the scope of habeas corpus to its historical position in Montana. It is intended that most post conviction remedies will be provided by the post conviction hearing section. In any event it must be noted that the scope of the writ is broader than it once was due to the federal decisions. Further habeas corpus is not controlled by statutory law, but rather by case development, thus making it necessary to have only a general outline available in the code.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At beginning of (2) substituted "The writ of habeas corpus" for "Relief under this chapter" and deleted last sentence that read: "Relief for such purposes is limited to the provisions of Title 46, chapter 21"; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendment: In (2) near beginning of first sentence, after "conviction", inserted "or sentence" and at end of first sentence inserted "nor is relief under this chapter available to attack the legality of an order revoking a suspended or deferred sentence".

1981 Amendment: Inserted "Except as provided in subsection (2)" in (1); and inserted (2) denying relief if appeal remedy is exhausted and denying relief as to an order revoking a suspended or deferred sentence and stating that relief for those purposes is limited to chapter 21 of this title.

GENERAL

Facially Invalid Sentence — Statutory Bar Against Appeal Unconstitutional — Habeas Corpus Relief Granted: Lott was sentenced in 1992 for aggravated kidnapping, sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated burglary, and felony assault, and each sentence was enhanced by 10 years for use of a dangerous weapon. The 5-year limit on appealing the sentences that was in effect at sentencing (now a 1-year limit) expired, so Lott was procedurally barred from challenging the sentences. The Supreme Court subsequently decided in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), that application of the weapons enhancement to a felony offense that itself required proving use of a weapon constituted a double jeopardy violation. Guillaume was held to apply retroactively in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), so Lott's sentence was unconstitutionally enhanced with regard to the aggravated burglary and felony assault convictions. The state asserted that Lott was procedurally barred from raising the issue in a habeas corpus petition because Lott did not raise the issue on direct appeal or in a petition for postconviction relief. After analyzing habeas corpus and postconviction relief in Montana, the Supreme Court noted the constitutional guarantee that the writ of habeas corpus may never be suspended and concluded that as applied to a facially invalid sentence, the procedural bar in this section unconstitutionally suspends the writ. Even if Lott had filed a direct appeal or petition for postconviction relief, the double jeopardy argument would have been unavailing because Guillaume and Whitehorn were not decided until well after both filing dates had expired. In order to avoid a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice, the Supreme Court granted Lott's petition for habeas corpus and remanded for resentencing pursuant to Guillaume and Whitehorn. Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006), followed in St. v. Jackson, 2007 MT 186, 338 M 344, 165 P3d 321 (2007), and St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Barred by Seven-Year Lapse: Following remand of St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514 (1993), in 1993, the District Court set forth findings of fact supporting Morrison's 3-year dangerous offender sentence that had been added to Morrison's 20-year prison sentence for sexual intercourse without consent, and Morrison's sentence became final. In 2000, Morrison petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that the 3-year sentence enhancement should be vacated because the use of a weapon had not been charged as a separate offense in the information and that the court relied on false or misleading evidence to support the enhancement. The court treated the petition as one for postconviction relief and denied it as untimely. Morrison appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the version of 46-21-102 in effect at the time of Morrison's final conviction in 1993, the statute of limitations required that petitions for postconviction relief be filed within 5 years after conviction became final. Morrison's petition was not filed until 7 years after conviction. Notwithstanding Morrison's argument that the statute of limitations should be equitably tolled, the petition was not timely and the District Court properly dismissed it. Morrison v. Mahoney, 2002 MT 21, 308 M 196, 41 P3d 320 (2002). See also Thomas v. Doe, 2011 MT 283, 362 Mont. 454, 266 P.3d 1255, which held the Supreme Court will no longer consider as an original petition a party's appeal from a District Court's denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

Defendant Incarcerated Prior to Sentencing Entitled to Ten Days a Month of Good Time Credit: Sebastian argued that the policy of awarding 10 days of good time allowance a month for presentence incarceration served under 53-30-105 (now repealed) constituted a wealth-based classification, in violation of MacPheat v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 62, 299 M 46, 997 P2d 753 (2000). The Supreme Court noted that it had previously addressed the good time issue in Corcoran v. Mahoney, No. 00-346 (July 2000), an unpublished opinion holding that because security levels in county jails are consistent with close custody security classifications at the state prison, defendants who are incarcerated prior to sentencing are entitled to 10 days a month of good time credit under the former good time statute. The court found the policy determination that pretrial detainees are entitled to no more than 10 days of good time credit to be reasonable and declined to apply the classification system in MacPheat to pretrial detainees. Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001).

Minimal Liberty Interest of Prison Inmate: As an inmate at the state prison, Jellison participated in a sitdown demonstration, repeatedly disobeying direct orders from corrections officers. Jellison claimed that his subsequent detention and custody reclassification violated his due process rights and right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court disagreed and denied Jellison's petition for relief. Considering that prison disciplinary actions take place in a closed, tightly controlled environment peopled by those who have chosen to violate the criminal law and have been lawfully incarcerated for doing so, the liberty interest of an inmate is minimal and is generally limited to freedom from restraint that, although not exceeding the sentence in such an unexpected manner as to give rise to protection by the due process clause by its own force, nevertheless imposes atypical and significant hardship on the inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. Discipline in segregated confinement does not generally rise to that level, nor does custody classification generally implicate a liberty interest sufficient to give rise to due process protection for an inmate. Further, Jellison was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment because prison officials are accorded wide-ranging deference in adopting policies to preserve internal order and discipline among the inmates, including prophylactic and preventative measures intended to reduce the incidence of breaches of prison order. Jellison v. Mahoney, 1999 MT 217, 295 M 540, 986 P2d 1089, 56 St. Rep. 853 (1999).

Consideration of Moot Issue of Right to Reasonable Bail: Although a petition to the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus was moot because petitioner was no longer in custody, the issue was the petitioner's right to reasonable bail, and the court accepted jurisdiction to address the substantive issues by writ of supervisory control in order to address a constitutional issue capable of repetition. Wier v. Lincoln County Sheriff's Dept., 278 M 473, 925 P2d 1172, 53 St. Rep. 1013 (1996).

Writ of Habeas Corpus Treated as Petition for Postconviction Relief and Time-Barred: Petitioner brought a writ of habeas corpus 8 years after having been convicted. The Supreme Court treated the writ as a petition for postconviction relief but held that relief was time-barred under this section because the writ was brought more than 5 years after conviction. Rudolph v. Day, 273 M 309, 902 P2d 1007, 52 St. Rep. 988 (1995), followed in George v. Bd. of Pardons, 2001 MT 163, 306 M 115, 30 P3d 1065 (2001). See also St. v. Howard, 282 M 522, 938 P2d 710, 54 St. Rep. 464 (1997).

Substitution of Postconviction Proceedings for Habeas Corpus Proceedings When Appeals Exhausted — Not Unconstitutional Suspension of Habeas Corpus Writ: The District Court dismissed defendant's habeas corpus petition, relying on this section, which provides that habeas corpus relief is not available to attack the validity of a conviction or sentence of a person adjudged guilty in a court of record who has exhausted the remedy of appeal. Defendant argued that this section was an unconstitutional suspension of the constitutional right to a writ of habeas corpus. However, relying on Swain v. Pressley, 430 US 372, 51 L Ed 2d 411, 97 S Ct 1224 (1977), the Supreme Court held that the substitution of postconviction proceedings for habeas corpus proceedings when a petitioner has exhausted the right of appeal does not amount to a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Release From Custody: Two days after defendant filed an application for a writ of habeas corpus in the District Court, he was released from custody by a Justice's Court. The District Court did not notice the application for hearing. Because defendant was not in custody, he was not deprived of his liberty and the petition became moot. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991).

Habeas Corpus Inappropriate Remedy: In an original proceeding before the Supreme Court, petitioners protested the physical conditions under which they were held in a county jail. They alleged a tort cause of action and violation of their constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. They sought relief under the habeas corpus and declaratory judgment statutes. Habeas corpus is not an appropriate remedy because it allows a prisoner to challenge the legal sufficiency of the cause for his incarceration, not the physical conditions under which he is held. Gates v. Missoula County Comm'rs, 235 M 261, 766 P2d 884, 45 St. Rep. 2370 (1988).

Application Granted — Incarceration and No Other Pending Action: Application for a Writ of Habeas Corpus is proper when petitioner was incarcerated at the time of petitioning and when no application for a Writ of Certiorari was pending in the District Court. Crane v. St., 200 M 280, 650 P2d 794, 39 St. Rep. 1743 (1982).

Denial of Federal Constitutional Rights: A Writ of Habeas Corpus is not available in the state courts of Montana to correct denials of federal constitutional rights. Brown v. St., 202 F. Supp. 29 (D.C. Mont. 1962).

Purpose: The purpose of a Writ of Habeas Corpus is to determine the legality or illegality of the restraint alleged to be exercised; it is available only to persons unlawfully imprisoned or restrained of their liberty, and is independent of the legal proceeding under which the detention is sought to be justified. August v. Burns, 79 M 198, 255 P 737 (1927).

PROCEDURE

Life Sentence for Juvenile Offender Upheld — Miller v. Alabama Is Procedural Rule — Not Substantive — Not Watershed Procedural — Not Retroactive on Collateral Review: In 1984, petitioner was sentenced to the maximum sentence of 100 years' imprisonment for a deliberate homicide that was committed when he was age 17. Twenty-eight years later, the U.S. Supreme Court held in Miller v. Alabama, 567 US 460, 132 S Ct 2455 (2012), that: (1) mandated life incarceration without the possibility of parole for a juvenile offender is unconstitutional; and (2) a sentencer must follow a certain process before imposing a life without the possibility of parole sentence on a juvenile. In light of Miller, petitioner, in a habeas corpus proceeding, argued that his sentence is equal to life without parole and unconstitutional given that his sentencer did not consider how age counseled against his sentence. After concluding that the sentencing consideration rule is a new rule, subject to the general rule of nonretroactivity, the Supreme Court declined to apply an exception and label the rule as a substantive rule or a watershed procedural rule. Instead, the court determined that Miller is a procedural rule that is not retroactive on collateral review and it did not reach the merits in the case. Beach v. St., 2015 MT 118, 379 Mont. 74, 348 P.3d 629.

Appeal From District Court's Denial of Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus Prohibited: After the District Court denied a criminal defendant's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court held it will no longer consider as an original petition a party's appeal from a District Court's denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. A petitioner must file an original petition for a writ of habeas corpus in the Supreme Court in order for the court to consider it. Thomas v. Doe, 2011 MT 283, 362 Mont. 454, 266 P.3d 1255.

Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus Not Necessarily Mooted by Release of Petitioner From Physical Custody: Sebastian argued that he was entitled to a writ of habeas corpus because he was being unlawfully imprisoned under the Department of Corrections good time policy. The state contended that the legality of Sebastian's imprisonment was moot because he had been released from incarceration. Sebastian argued that even though he was released from prison, he was still suffering under an unlawful restraint on his liberty because the discharge date of the 10-year suspended sentence that he was serving depended on good time credit to which he was entitled. The Supreme Court noted that release from custody may moot some habeas corpus petitions because the relief requested, i.e., release from unlawful imprisonment, can no longer be granted. However, release from physical custody does not necessarily moot the petition when the court can still grant effective relief. In this case, the completion date of Sebastian's suspended sentence depended on the discharge date of his term of confinement and was thus based on the jail good time credit to which he was entitled. If the good time policy was in fact unlawful and its application to Sebastian's prison term led to an erroneous discharge date, the completion date of the suspended sentence would also be incorrect. Thus, despite the fact that Sebastian was no longer imprisoned, it was still within the power of the court to grant relief to prevent the possible unlawful restraint on Sebastian's liberty, so the petition was not moot, and the court went on to address the merits of the petition. Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001).

Personal Appearance Before Parole Board — Subject Matter Jurisdiction to Determine Due Process Violation: Sage maintained that he had a right to due process, based on a liberty interest in parole pursuant to 46-23-201, that was violated by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) when it did not allow him to personally appear before the Board at a parole hearing. Further, Sage maintained that the District Court had subject matter jurisdiction to decide by writ of habeas corpus whether his due process rights had been violated. The Board asserted that Sage's alleged due process violations fell outside the parameters of habeas corpus relief and that the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to consider the issue. The Supreme Court held that the alleged deprivation of Sage's right to due process was directly related to whether the cause of his continued incarceration was legal, thus falling within the parameters of this section, and that the District Court therefore did have subject matter jurisdiction to determine whether the right to due process was violated. Pursuant to Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebr. Penal & Correctional Complex, 442 US 1 (1979), the opportunity of a parole applicant to appear before those entrusted with the subjective responsibility of passing judgment on the application is an important element of the due process to which the applicant is entitled. Based on the plain language of 46-23-202 and ARM 20.25.401, an inmate who is eligible for parole is clearly provided the right to personally appear at an interview "before the parole board" prior to the Board's decision to grant or deny the application for parole. Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822, 53 St. Rep. 1234 (1996).

Petition for Writ Procedurally Barred: The defendant refused to cooperate with his appointed appellate attorney. The attorney was relieved, and the defendant was ordered to proceed pro se and was given an extension of time to file his appellate brief. Two weeks after the time period expired, the Supreme Court dismissed his appeal. The defendant then petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, raising, among other issues, the issue of whether there was probable cause for his arrest and the search of his home. The Supreme Court ruled that the defendant is procedurally barred from attacking the validity of his conviction when he has been adjudged guilty of an offense in a court of record and has exhausted the remedy of appeal. Duncan v. St., 243 M 232, 794 P2d 331, 47 St. Rep. 738 (1990), followed in Rudolph v. Day, 273 M 309, 902 P2d 1007, 52 St. Rep. 988 (1995).

Exhaustion of State Remedies: When a federal claim was never fairly presented to the state court, the federal District Court denied a petition for want of exhaustion of state remedies. Swan v. Crist, 36 St. Rep. 746 (D.C. Mont. 1979) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Question of Speedy Trial Not Proper Issue in Asylum State: The issue of the lack of a speedy trial is not properly cognizable by a court of the asylum state in a habeas corpus proceeding in that court contesting extradition to another state. In re Hart, 178 M 235, 583 P2d 411 (1978).

Exhaustion of State Remedies: A petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was denied a prisoner convicted in Montana but imprisoned in Nevada because his state remedies had not been exhausted. Evans v. Wolff, 427 F. Supp. 400 (D.C. Mont. 1977).

Motives of Prosecution: On a hearing of a habeas corpus sued out for the liberation of one who is sought to be extradited for the violation in another state it is not admissible to hear evidence upon, or to inquire into, the motives or purposes of the prosecution. St. v. Booth, 134 M 235, 328 P2d 1104 (1958).

Trial Court Jurisdiction — Presumption: On application for Writ of Habeas Corpus, which presents the inquiry whether the trial court had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the prosecution and of the defendant and to render such a judgment as the law authorizes in the particular case, the presumption of jurisdiction is conclusive unless want of it appears on the face of the record, and express recitals of jurisdictional facts cannot be rebutted by evidence beyond the record. In re Shaffer, 70 M 609, 227 P 37 (1924).

Objection That Facts Do Not Constitute an Offense — When Taken: Under former law, the objection that the facts stated in an information do not constitute a public offense could be taken by demurrer, at the trial under a plea of not guilty, or after the trial in arrest of judgment. St. v. Smith, 58 M 567, 194 P 131 (1920).

Not of a Criminal Nature: Habeas corpus is not a special proceeding of a criminal nature. State ex rel. Brandegee v. Clements, 52 M 57, 155 P 271 (1916). See also State ex rel. Hepner v. District Court, 40 M 17, 104 P 872 (1909); State ex rel. Jackson v. Kennie, 24 M 45, 60 P 589 (1900); State ex rel. Newell v. Newell, 13 M 302, 34 P 28 (1893).

Petitioner Not Defendant: The term "defendant" is not a proper designation for a petitioner in a habeas corpus proceeding. State ex rel. Jackson v. Kennie, 24 M 45, 60 P 589 (1900).

WRIT GRANTED

Illegal Revocation of Sentence — Habeas Corpus Relief Warranted: The state petitioned to revoke Borgen's suspended sentence, and the District Court granted the petition and resentence Borgen to incarceration for an additional 14 years. Borgen petitioned for habeas corpus relief. The Supreme Court determined that after an illegal weapon enhancement sentence was subtracted from Borgen's original sentence, the total time remaining on Borgen's suspended sentence was about 9 years, 1 month. However, the petition to revoke the suspended sentence was not filed until 9 years, 8 months after sentencing. Because the legal portion of Borgen's sentence had expired before the petition to revoke was filed, revocation of Borgen's sentence was facially illegal, and Borgen's incarceration constituted a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice warranting habeas corpus relief. Therefore, the Supreme Court granted Borgen's petition, vacated the sentence revocation, and ordered that Borgen be released from custody. Borgen v. Sorrell, 2009 MT 143, 350 M 339, 217 P3d 1022 (2009). See also Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006).

Good Time Credit for Indigent Defendant Confined to County Detention Facility: The decision in Bearden v. Ga., 461 US 660, 76 L Ed 2d 221, 103 S Ct 2064 (1983), clearly and unambiguously stands for the principle that to deprive a criminal defendant of freedom simply because, through no want of bona fide effort, willful refusal, or fault of the defendant, the defendant lacks the financial resources to buy liberty is contrary to the fundamental fairness required by the 14th amendment to the U.S. Constitution. This is not to say that poverty insulates a defendant from having to post a reasonable bond should the facts and circumstances of the case so require. However, if a criminal defendant is unable to secure presentence freedom by posting bail for no other reason than indigency, that defendant is entitled to good time credit for the presentence time spent in a county detention facility to the same extent that the law allows good time credit to the criminal defendant who is able to post bail and thus serve the entirety of a sentence in the state correctional facility. In the present case, it was not clear from the record whether defendant was offered or denied bail and whether, if offered, the sole reason for defendant's inability to post bail was indigency; nevertheless, the Supreme Court granted defendant's petition for writ of habeas corpus and remanded to the District Court for a determination of whether defendant was entitled to good time credit for time served in the county detention facility. MacPheat v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 62, 299 M 46, 997 P2d 753, 57 St. Rep. 291 (2000), following MacFarlane v. Walter, 179 F3d 1131 (9th Cir. 1999), followed in Eisenman v. St., 2000 MT 170, 300 M 322, 5 P3d 542, 57 St. Rep. 704 (2000), in which the case of an indigent defendant was remanded for a determination of whether defendant was detained presentence in a county detention facility because he was too poor to post bail and thus entitled to credit for good time under the MacPheat test, and distinguished in Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001). Citing MacPheat, see also Reece v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 7, 304 M 80, 18 P3d 314 (2001). However, see also McGinnis v. Royster, 410 US 263, 35 L Ed 2d 282, 93 S Ct 1055 (1973).

Juvenile Transferred From Correctional Institution to Mental Health Facility: The Supreme Court upheld issuance of a Writ of Habeas Corpus when a juvenile was transferred under 53-21-130 from a juvenile correctional institution to a mental health facility and the record did not indicate that petitioner's transfer was caused by an emergency or that petitioner was afforded any due process protection upon expiration of the 10-day period specified in 53-21-130. In re the Petition of M.C., 211 M 105, 683 P2d 956, 41 St. Rep. 1242 (1984).

Jurisdiction to Revoke Deferred Sentence — Only During Period of Deferral: Petitioner was convicted of felony theft. On May 22, 1978, he was given a 3-year deferred imposition of sentence on the condition that restitution be made. On August 20, 1979, this deferred sentence was continued and petitioner was ordered to complete restitution by November 5, 1980. This was not done, and a petition to revoke the deferred sentence was filed on January 16, 1981. A hearing on the petition was held May 27, 1981, 3 years and 5 days after the initial deferral. The court revoked the deferred sentence and sentenced petitioner to 3½ years in prison, over petitioner's objections that the District Court was without jurisdiction to do so. The District Court contended it retained jurisdiction when the petition to revoke was filed within the deferral time. On a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Supreme Court held that 46-18-203 grants jurisdiction to revoke suspended sentences or impose sentences following deferral only during the period of the suspended or deferred sentences. This jurisdiction extends only through the running of the suspended or deferred sentence, regardless of whether a petition for revocation has been filed prior to the termination of the suspended or deferred sentence. (See 1985 amendment note.) Felix v. Mohler, 195 M 391, 636 P2d 830, 38 St. Rep. 1881 (1981).

Child Custody: While the welfare of a child in the matter of its custody is of paramount interest in a habeas corpus proceeding involving custody, neither such interest nor the child's wish will justify a court in denying its custody to the surviving parent, in the absence of a showing of unfitness or inability to support the child, and turning it over to a stranger. August v. Burns, 79 M 198, 255 P 737 (1927).

WRIT DENIED

Defendant Unable to Complete Residential Treatment Program Not Yet Established — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: In 1996, Johnson was sentenced to 10 years for felony aggravated kidnapping and 40 years for felony sexual intercourse without consent, with the terms to run concurrently. In 2007, 46-18-207 was enacted, which provided in part for the suspension of sentences for inmates who successfully completed the residential sexual offender treatment program established by the legislation. Johnson filed a writ of habeas corpus, asserting that his sentence for sexual intercourse without consent should be suspended because he had completed sex offender treatment programs in Arizona and Montana and further arguing that he was eligible for sexual offender treatment under 46-18-207. The District Court denied the writ and Johnson appealed, but the Supreme Court denied and dismissed the writ. The residential treatment program authorized in 46-18-207 was not yet established as of the date of the writ, so Johnson could not avail himself of the statutorily authorized program or of the benefits of 46-18-207. Additionally, even if Johnson was eligible for the program, placement is within the discretion of the Department of Corrections, and Johnson was ineligible in any case because of his conviction for aggravated kidnapping, which is one of the exceptions to the operation of 46-18-207. Johnson v. Mahoney, 2009 MT 275, 352 M 136, 217 P3d 1025 (2009).

Showing of Good Cause Required Prior to Appointment of State Public Defender in Habeas Corpus Proceedings: More than a simple motion is required before the Supreme Court will appoint the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD) to represent a person seeking habeas corpus relief. In such case, OSPD counsel will be appointed only upon a demonstration of good cause. A showing of likelihood of the illegality of the sentence of the person seeking relief, and that the sentence will be shortened or terminated if habeas corpus relief is granted, is required before OSPD counsel will be appointed. A statement that an applicant is untrained or unskilled in the law is insufficient, without more, to establish good cause. Dyer v. Mahoney, 2008 MT 117, 342 M 495, 182 P3d 737 (2008).

No Showing That Defendant's Rights Violated by Failure to Make Bail or to Be Released on Own Recognizance — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: Following Miller's arrest on charges of negligent homicide and failure to remain at the scene of an accident, the District Court set bail at $30,000. When Miller could not make bail, the amount was reduced to $10,000. Indigent, Miller could not pay the reduced bail and remained incarcerated. Miller petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that his continued incarceration was a violation of 46-9-106 and 46-9-111 and the constitutional guarantees of bail and against excessive sanctions. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant has a presumptive right to be released on a reasonable bail or on the defendant's own recognizance on conditions that will protect the community. However, the burden in a habeas corpus proceeding is on the petitioner to present a record that is sufficient to make a prima facie showing that the District Court's order constituted a violation, deprivation, infringement, or denial of the petitioner's constitutional, statutory, or legal rights. After considering the meager record and the seriousness of the allegations, the Supreme Court was not convinced that Miller had no ability to provide any bail or that the District Court could have released Miller on conditions that could be enforced and that could ensure the protection of the community. Thus, Miller failed to show that his rights were violated, and his petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. Miller v. District Court, 2007 MT 58, 336 M 207, 154 P3d 1186 (2007).

Federal Prohibition Against Penalty Beyond Statutory Maximum Not Retroactively Applicable: Following Gratzner's 1982 conviction for deliberate homicide, the District Court sentenced Gratzner to a consecutive 10-year term for using a weapon in committing the crime. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently decided Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000) (followed in Ring v. Ariz., 536 US 584 (2002), and Blakely v. Wash., 542 US 296 (2004)), holding that other than the fact of a prior conviction, any fact that increases a penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Gratzner later petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus on grounds that the consecutive sentence for use of a weapon was a violation of Gratzner's constitutional rights. Gratzner's sentence enhancement was not submitted to the jury, so Apprendi was potentially applicable. Notwithstanding that Gratzner's conviction became final in 1984, long before Apprendi and its progeny were decided, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered Gratzner's claim pursuant to Teague v. Lane, 498 US 288 (1989), on grounds of whether Apprendi and its progeny applied retroactively. Under Teague, a new constitutional rule of criminal procedure does not apply retroactively to cases on collateral review unless the rule: (1) places certain kinds of primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal lawmaking authority to proscribe; or (2) qualifies as a watershed rule of criminal procedure. Noting that the U.S. Supreme Court held that Ring (and by implication Apprendi and Blakely) did not apply retroactively in Schiro v. Summerlin, 542 US 348 (2004), the court applied the Schiro rationale to Gratzner's case, holding that Apprendi failed to satisfy the first Teague exception for retroactivity because Apprendi announced a rule that did not inhibit the state's ability to substantively proscribe and punish a defendant for using a weapon in the commission of an offense, but merely established procedures that the state must follow in doing so, nor did the Apprendi rule qualify as a watershed rule of criminal procedure without which the likelihood of an accurate conviction would be seriously diminished. Federal courts of appeals nearly unanimously agree that the Apprendi line of cases do not apply retroactively to cases on collateral review, and the Supreme Court concurred. Gratzner's petition was denied. Gratzner v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Life Sentence Without Parole Not Violative of Constitutional Rights: Gratzner asserted that the sentencing court exceeded its authority and violated the constitutional right to habeas corpus when the court sentenced Gratzner to life without the possibility of parole. Gratzner's argument was that use of the word "term" implied that there was a distinction between sentences imposed for a specific time and indeterminate life sentences and that the statutory sentencing scheme does not authorize a court to remove a prisoner's eligibility for parole if the prisoner is serving a life sentence. The Supreme Court declined to recognize the distinction. "Term" is used throughout the criminal code to refer to the duration of a sentence without any indication that it is meant to refer exclusively to determinate time sentences, and the language in 46-18-202 that allows a court to impose the parole eligibility exception applies equally to time sentences and life sentences. A sentence of imprisonment in the state prison for a term exceeding 1 year refers to all felonies, including those punishable by a life sentence, rather than a cryptic means of limiting a sentencing court's ability to restrict the parole eligibility of prisoners serving life sentences. The District Court did not violate Gratzner's rights, and the sentence of life without parole was affirmed. Gratzner v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Attempt to Use Writ of Habeas Corpus to Demand Physical Presence of Children Removed From Parent in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding — Petition Properly Denied: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and had been removed from her custody unlawfully. The petition was denied. On appeal, the mother cited In re Bertelson, 189 M 524, 617 P2d 121 (1980), for the proposition that a writ of habeas corpus was the appropriate procedural device to bring the custody matter before a court. The Supreme Court disagreed and distinguished Bertelson because the mother's position ignored the substantial differences between dissolution proceedings and abuse and neglect proceedings, differences that were not at issue in Bertelson. The court also cited its earlier holding in In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982 (2000), in which it was held that the children were properly removed from the mother's home. Because temporary custody of the children with the state was legal, relief pursuant to habeas corpus premised on illegal restraint was not available to the mother under these circumstances. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Denial of Writ of Habeas Corpus to Compel Attendance of Children in Abuse and Neglect Hearing Not Violative of Due Process Rights or Right to Confront Witnesses: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and claiming that the writ was necessary to ensure her due process rights by having the children available to rebut allegations against her at the hearing. The petition was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the mother was entitled to an opportunity for a meaningful hearing, that opportunity need not be provided at the expense of the children whose best interests were the paramount focus of the proceeding, and subjecting the children to direct and cross-examination could exacerbate the abuse that they had already experienced. Denial of the petition did not violate the mother's right to confront witnesses because the children were not her accusers and she had no right to confront them. Rather, the abuse and neglect case was brought by the state, and the mother had ample opportunity to confront and examine the state's witnesses and experts at the hearing, so her due process rights were met. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Allegation of Newly Discovered Evidence — Failure to Timely Appeal — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: The Supreme Court denied a petition for writ of habeas corpus based on allegations of newly discovered medical evidence, noting that there was no showing as to what constituted the new evidence and that petitioner was afforded the right of appeal but did not take it. Tecca v. McCormick, 246 M 317, 806 P2d 11, 47 St. Rep. 2068 (1990), followed in Blaney v. Gamble, 266

M 51, 879 P2d 51, 51 St. Rep. 466 (1994). Tecca was distinguished in Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Consider Time Served — Remand — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: Petitioner was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison for aggravated assault, with all 5 years suspended upon certain conditions. He served 4½ years of the suspended sentence before violating probation. After an appropriate petition, the District Court revoked the suspended sentence and sentenced petitioner to 5 years in the state prison, with 2 years suspended upon certain conditions. Petitioner sought a writ of habeas corpus seeking restoration of his good time but not appealing his sentence or conviction. After review, the Supreme Court held that the District Court had jurisdiction to revoke the suspended sentence and impose the original sentence but remanded for compliance with 46-18-201, requiring the District Court to consider elapsed time and state its reasons for either expressly allowing or rejecting elapsed time as credit against the sentence. The petition for writ of habeas corpus was denied for failure to set forth any basis for granting the writ, Speldrich v. McCormick, 243 M 238, 794 P2d 339, 47 St. Rep. 1186 (1990), followed in St. v. Docken, 274 M 296, 908 P2d 213, 52 St. Rep. 1240 (1995).

Prisoner Alleging Deprivation of Good Time: The Supreme Court denied petitioner's request, under a Writ of Habeas Corpus petition, to be credited for good time for participation in an education program although confined in maximum security. The computations of the state officials were found accurate. It was within their jurisdiction to impose rules under 53-30-105 (now repealed) which properly avoid good time awards in excess of the statutory provisions. Seadin v. Crist, 187 M 112, 608 P2d 1094, 37 St. Rep. 953 (1980).

Indigent Prisoners: Denial of trial transcript to an indigent prisoner does not violate his rights unless there has been some showing of need or a meritorious reason. Petition of Parker, 162 M 330, 511 P2d 973 (1973).

No Effect on Release: The Writ of Habeas Corpus is directed at unlawful imprisonment or restraint of liberty, and when, even if the Writ had been issued, it would not have resulted in the release of the petitioner from confinement since he was confined under a 5-year sentence imposed concurrently with his original 10-year sentence, habeas corpus was denied. In re Wagner's Petition, 145 M 101, 399 P2d 761 (1965).

Insufficient Commitment to Jail: When a Justice of the Peace, upon adjudging one guilty of contempt for disobeying a subpoena, imposed a fine of $100 and, upon refusal of payment, committed him to jail until payment was made and thereafter accepted a cash bond in lieu of fine and imprisonment pending final disposition of a certiorari proceeding and appeal to the Supreme Court, the objection that the commitment was insufficient under a former statute requiring imprisonment until payment of a fine would not lie since, if the Sheriff presumed to hold the contemner, the proper remedy would be habeas corpus. State ex rel. Mercer v. Woods, 116 M 533, 155 P2d 197 (1945).

Defective Indictment Not Ground for Relief: On an application for habeas corpus under former law, the court would not determine whether the indictment upon which the complainant was convicted was defective since the writ could not be used as a substitute for a demurrer or a motion to quash, its inquiry being confined to a determination of the validity of the process on its face and whether the court had jurisdiction of the offense charged. State ex rel. Boone v. Tullock, 72 M 482, 234 P 277 (1925).

Petit or Grand Larceny: When a person, after a preliminary examination, is committed for grand larceny and, upon his suing out a Writ of Habeas Corpus on the ground that he is guilty of petit larceny only, it appears from the evidence before the Justice that he was guilty at least of petit larceny and that there was a reasonable basis for the belief that he was guilty of grand larceny, it is the imperative duty of the court to remand him. In re Jones, 46 M 122, 126 P 929 (1912).

Trial Court Jurisdiction: When the court imposed a prison sentence for a misdemeanor, its judgment was void as being in excess of its jurisdiction, and the prisoner was entitled to habeas corpus. St. v. District Court, 35 M 321, 89 P 63 (1907).

Legality of Custody: When a petitioner for habeas corpus was convicted of murder and an oral judgment was rendered confining him to prison for 25 years without any record being made, but at a special term, after notice to the petitioner and his counsel, the minutes were corrected to show the judgment as rendered, and on the judgment thus entered a commitment was issued, the petitioner was legally in custody for the purposes of the judgment and not entitled to his discharge. In re Dye, 32 M 132, 79 P 689 (1905).

Case Notes

Misspelling of Petitioner's Name — Extradition Proceedings Not Defective: Slight misspelling of petitioner's name on a criminal complaint and arrest warrant, where "Henrichs" was spelled "Hendricks", constituted a technical defect and did not render extradition proceedings defective in light of the fact that the description accompanying the warrant correctly described the petitioner. Under the doctrine of idem sonans, two names spelled differently are regarded as the same if they sound alike in their pronunciation. In re Henrichs, 237 M 59, 771 P2d 967, 46 St. Rep. 620 (1989).

Technical Defects: When the court intended to vacate sentence to permit representation by counsel but said that it was vacating judgment, this was a mere technical defect and would not form the basis for habeas corpus. In re Petition of Eldiwitw, 153 M 468, 457 P2d 909 (1969).

Curable Defects in Process: When the committing order stated that the defendant was convicted for the crime of burglary, together with a prior conviction of a felony, but the defendant was properly convicted and sentenced for robbery and had a prior conviction of a felony, the erroneous use of the word "burglary", which had been the prior felony for which the defendant had been convicted, did not constitute such a defect as to allow for a Writ of Habeas Corpus. In re Petition of Erickson, 146 M 456, 409 P2d 447 (1965).

Defective Indictment Not Ground for Relief: On an application for habeas corpus under former law, the court would not determine whether the indictment upon which the complainant was convicted was defective since the writ could not be used as a substitute for a demurrer or a motion to quash, its inquiry being confined to a determination of the validity of the process on its face and whether the court had jurisdiction of the offense charged. Case Notes

Denial of Bond Pending Appeal — Method of Supreme Court Review — Jurisdiction: After conviction for negligent homicide and on related charges, Ingraham moved the District Court to continue bond pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion, finding that Ingraham was a danger to the community and therefore did not meet the requirements of 46-9-107. Ingraham then moved the Supreme Court, pursuant to former Rule 22, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to continue bond pending appeal or, in the alternative, to accept appeal of the District Court's order denying bond, pursuant to former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and 46-20-104. The Attorney General moved to dismiss, contending that there was no provision in law for appeal from a District Court order denying bond pending appeal and that Ingraham should have brought an original habeas corpus proceeding. The Supreme Court agreed with the Attorney General and dismissed Ingraham's motion or appeal, holding that Ingraham should have brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to this section. Ingraham then filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which was filed with Justice Trieweiler pursuant to 3-2-212. Justice Trieweiler granted the petition to the extent necessary for the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing as provided by statute, under the theory that the District Court was the more appropriate court for the hearing than was the Supreme Court. The Attorney General opposed the order by applying to the full Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, arguing, contrary to the state's previous position, that this section does not really apply to persons convicted in a criminal case and that the more appropriate procedure was an original proceeding "in the nature of habeas corpus" before the full Supreme Court. The application for a writ of supervisory control was denied, was treated by the Supreme Court as a late-filed response to Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and was referred to Justice Triewweiler. Justice Triewweiler determined that it was inappropriate for him alone to determine the form of review of the District Court's denial of bond. Justice Triewweiler also determined that: (1) Ingraham had no constitutional right to bond pending appeal; (2) Ingraham did have a right to the proper exercise of the District Court's discretion in the application of 46-9-107; and (3) that right was a substantial right for the purposes of 46-20-104. For these reasons, Justice Triewweiler vacated his previous order granting Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and referred the matter to the full Supreme Court for review of the District Court's order denying bond pending appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Consideration of Moot Issue of Right to Reasonable Bail: Although a petition to the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus was moot because petitioner was no longer in custody, the issue was the petitioner's right to reasonable bail, and the court accepted jurisdiction to address the substantive issues by writ of supervisory control in order to address a constitutional issue capable of repetition. Wier v. Lincoln County Sheriff's Dept., 278 M 473, 925 P2d 1172, 53 St. Rep. 1013 (1996).

Convicted Felon Allowed Preconviction Bail Not Automatically Entitled to Bail Pending Appeal: Prior to his conviction for deliberate homicide, Moore was allowed bail, and following conviction, he was designated a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for purposes of parole eligibility. After conviction, Moore was denied bail pending appeal. Moore petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that he is entitled to bail pending appeal as a matter of law pursuant to 46-9-107 and 46-20-204. The Supreme Court found that under 46-9-107, the District Court was required to order the detention of Moore unless it found that he was "not likely to flee". Since the District Court made the opposite finding based on evidence presented at the hearing, the Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in the District Court's order denying bail pending appeal. The Supreme Court also held that the phrase "[i]f an appeal is taken and the defendant is admitted to bail" contained in 46-20-204(2) referred to bail pending appeal and requires that the District Court stay the execution of its sentence if the defendant is admitted to bail pending appeal. Because Moore was not admitted to bail pending appeal, his sentence should not be stayed. Moore v. McCormick, 260 M 305, 858 P2d 1254, 50 St. Rep. 1054 (1993).

When Bail Allowable: It is proper to allow bail in a homicide case in the absence of a showing by the County Attorney that the proof of the defendant's guilt is evident or the presumption thereof great. State ex rel. Murray v. District Court, 35 M 504, 90 P 513 (1907).

Case Notes

Appeal From District Court's Denial of Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus Prohibited: After the District Court denied a criminal defendant's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court held it will no longer consider as an original petition a party's appeal from a District Court's denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. A petitioner must file an original petition for a writ of habeas corpus in the Supreme Court in order for the court to consider it. Thomas v. Doe, 2011 MT 283, 362 Mont. 454, 266 P.3d 1255.

Jurisdiction of District Court to Grant Habeas Corpus: Defendant applied to District Court for Writ of Certiorari, and court decided to treat the application as one for habeas corpus. The Supreme Court held that District Court has no jurisdiction to consider Writ of Habeas Corpus unless defendant properly petitions for habeas corpus. St. v. Crane, 196 M 305, 639 P2d 514, 39 St. Rep. 126 (1982).

Liberal Construction for Jailed Pro Se Defendant: Where defendant was jailed and appeared pro se, court held it would liberally construe defendant's petition for relief and thus directed matter be held in abeyance for 30 days to allow petitioner to prepare and submit proper petition for habeas corpus. St. v. Crane, 196 M 305, 639 P2d 514, 39 St. Rep. 126 (1982).

Denial of Speedy Trial: Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus by petitioner being held on detainer from another state, alleging that delay by other state in lodging a detainer deprived petitioner of right to a speedy trial, was denied on grounds that petitioner had deprived himself of a speedy trial by fleeing from the other state, and his petition disclosed no factual basis as required by the statute on which to base the issuance of a Writ. Petition of Ferguson, 150 M 178, 432 P2d 773 (1967).

Case Notes

Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus Not Necessarily Mooted by Release of Petitioner From Physical Custody: Sebastian argued that he was entitled to a writ of habeas corpus because he was being unlawfully imprisoned under the Department of Corrections good time policy. The state contended that the legality of Sebastian's imprisonment was moot because he had been released from incarceration. Sebastian argued that even though he was released from prison, he was still suffering under an unlawful restraint on his liberty because the discharge date of the 10-year suspended sentence that he was serving depended on good time credit to which he was entitled. The Supreme Court noted that release from custody may moot some habeas corpus petitions because the relief requested, i.e., release from unlawful imprisonment, can no longer be granted. However, release from physical custody does not necessarily moot the petition when the court can still grant effective relief. In this case, the completion date of Sebastian's suspended sentence depended on the discharge date of his term of confinement and was thus based on the jail good time credit to which he was entitled. If the good time policy was in fact unlawful and its application to Sebastian's prison term led to an erroneous discharge date, the completion date of the suspended sentence would also be incorrect. Thus, despite the fact that Sebastian was no longer imprisoned, it was still within the power of the court to grant relief to prevent the possible unlawful restraint on Sebastian's liberty, so the petition was not moot, and the court went on to address the merits of the petition. Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001).

Adoption Proceeding in Foreign Jurisdiction — Applicability of Habeas Corpus: A child was born to petitioner in Wyoming in 1980. She relinquished custody to a couple and moved to Montana. Petitioner executed handwritten instruments that were notarized relinquishing custody to the couple and stating she did not know the natural father. The couple began adoption proceedings in Wyoming. Petitioner then executed a written revocation of custody and petitioned for a Writ of Habeas Corpus for the child in Yellowstone County. The District Court deferred jurisdiction to the Wyoming court having jurisdiction of the adoption proceeding. The habeas corpus petition was properly filed in Yellowstone County because the child was currently located there. The District Court properly deferred jurisdiction because although petitioner contended she executed the written instruments under fraud and duress, those issues were equally triable in Wyoming. Under 40-7-108, the District Court could not determine whether Wyoming was an inconvenient forum, only whether the court itself was. The Supreme Court in upholding the District Court's action said in cases of simultaneous proceedings, the provisions of 40-7-107(3) should be followed. In re Peterson, 203 M 305, 661 P2d 40, 40 St. Rep. 465 (1983).

Case Notes

Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Inappropriate Remedy: The defendant pleaded guilty to a sexual offense after being told he would be eligible for parole in 1 year. The prosecutor and the judge were unaware that the prison's sexual offender program was a 2-year program. Due to the length of the program, the defendant was denied parole. The Supreme Court held that granting the writ of habeas corpus was proper because the guilty plea had been based upon a fundamental misunderstanding as to its consequences. The court also held that the lower court was correct in granting the defendant parole rather than allowing him to withdraw his plea, which would lead to further proceedings. Benjamin v. McCormick, 243 M 252, 792 P2d 7, 47 St. Rep. 887 (1990).

Return to Foreign Jurisdiction: Montana courts were not the proper forum for petitioner to obtain release where he had been concurrently sentenced in Wyoming and Montana and by reason of the judgment of the Wyoming court the warden of the Montana prison would not allow him to leave on parole unless he was taken to the Wyoming penitentiary to serve the balance of the term imposed there. Petition of Glover, 166 M 546, 539 P2d 721 (1975).

Credit for Time Served: When habeas corpus was granted to a petitioner who had served a considerable portion of his sentence and whose commitment was set aside and the petitioner was permitted to withdraw his guilty plea, the court held that 46-18-402 should be observed upon any subsequent imposition of a new sentence. *Morsette v. Habeas Corpus Denial Unappealable: The Supreme Court dismissed an appeal from a denial of defendant's Writ of Habeas Corpus since under Montana law no appeal lies from such order in a proceeding criminal in nature when the issue to be determined is the freedom of the petitioner or the legality of his detention. State ex rel. Graveley v. District Court, 178 M 1, 582 P2d 775 (1978), following St. v. Booth, 134 M 235, 328 P2d 1104 (1958).

CHAPTER 23 PROBATION, PAROLE, AND CLEMENCY

Chapter Administrative Rules

Title 20, chapter 25, ARM Board of Pardons and Parole.

Chapter Case Notes

Furlough Considered "Official Detention": The defendant was placed at a prerelease facility and was released on furlough with a scheduled return date. The defendant failed to return and was charged with escape pursuant to 45-7-306. The defendant moved to dismiss the escape charge on the basis that he was not in "official detention" while on furlough or, alternatively, that furlough should be considered parole and, therefore, exempt from the definition of "official detention". The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's denial of the motion to dismiss, concluding that under the language of 45-7-306, which the legislature amended in 1997, the defendant remained in "official detention" while on furlough. In addition, citing St. v. Romannose, 281 Mont. 84, 931 P.2d 1304 (1996), the Supreme Court rejected the defendant's argument that furlough should be considered parole, as distinctions exist between the two. St. v. Roundstone, 2011 MT 227, 362 Mont. 74, 261 P.3d 1009.

Supervised Release Program Not Inclusive of Furloughs — Escape Not Chargeable to Furloughed Convict: Roberts was released from the state prison into the parole-related furlough program rather than the supervised release program and did not meet the requirements of the administrative rules governing the supervised release program. A part of Roberts' parole included a 10-day furlough to allow him to find housing and employment. When he failed to meet his parole officer on a specified date, he was charged with felony escape. Roberts moved to dismiss the charge. An escape charge can be maintained only against a person subject to official detention, which is defined in part as supervision under a supervised release program. The term "supervised release program" clearly and unambiguously refers to the program codified in part 4 (now repealed) and not to the furlough associated with parole proceedings under 46-23-215. Because Roberts was not being supervised under a supervised release program, the District Court erred in concluding that Roberts could be prosecuted for escape and in denying his motion to dismiss the escape charge. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded with instructions to enter an order of dismissal. St. v. Roberts, 275 M 365, 912 P2d 812, 53 St. Rep. 181 (1996). See also St. v. Roundstone, 2011 MT 227, 362 Mont. 74, 261 P.3d 1009.

Prisoner on Furlough — Federal Search and Seizure Law: Plaintiff was released from prison on an educational furlough to attend the University of Montana (now University of Montana-Missoula). A deputy received a tip that plaintiff had drugs in his dorm room. The deputy called plaintiff's parole officer who determined that plaintiff had not signed a consent to be searched when furloughed. No search warrant was procured, but the search was conducted and drugs were seized. The evidence was suppressed and plaintiff's furlough continued. Plaintiff then brought this action seeking damages for violation of his civil rights. The federal courts have distinguished between a private citizen and a convict who is paroled prior to the expiration of his term, stating that a parolee does not have the expectations of privacy (see Art. II, sec. 10, Mont. Const.) enjoyed by other citizens. One of these restrictions is that the parolee and his home are subject to search by the parole officer when he reasonably believes that such search is necessary in the performance of his duties. Montana law may differ (see St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980)), but this case charged violations of the United States Constitution, and under it the search was not constitutionally infirm. Quigg v. France, 502 F. Supp. 516, 37 St. Rep. 2113 (D.C. Mont. 1980).

Escape From Prison Furlough Program — Misdemeanor: A prisoner furlough program does not fit within the definition of "prison". Where defendants walked away from such programs, no risk of violence was involved and they could be convicted only of misdemeanor escape. St. v. Whiteshield, 185 M 208, 605 P2d 189 (1980).

Chapter Attorney General's Opinions

Application Based Solely on Medical Grounds Acceptable: An eligible inmate may present to the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) an application for a furlough program that is based solely on medical treatment grounds. Discretion to approve or deny the application is vested in the Board. 42 A.G. Op. 57 (1988).

Prisoner Furlough Program — Short-Term Furlough: A furlough may be granted for a specific limited period of time after which the prisoner may be required to return to prison unless he applies for and is granted a new furlough. 37 A.G. Op. 114 (1978). See 37 A.G. Op. 82 (1977).

Board of Pardons (Now Board of Pardons and Parole): The responsibilities and powers of the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) are distinguished from those of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) in administering the prisoner furlough program. 37 A.G. Op. 82 (1977).

Notification Required: The Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) shall solicit information about pertinent case material from officials and individuals in the sentencing community before approving or denying a furlough application. It is the responsibility of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) to notify and to obtain approval of law enforcement agencies to which the furlougher is released. 37 A.G. Op. 82 (1977).

Prisoner Furlough — Application: Unless the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) has adopted reasonable rules prohibiting application by certain prisoners until a certain state of incarceration, a prisoner may make application for furlough any time during incarceration. No rule may prevent a prisoner from applying for furlough at any time after he has served one-half the time required to be considered for parole [and, by 1981 amendment, not more than 15 months remain before he is eligible for parole]. 37 A.G. Op. 82 (1977).

Review of Furlough Plans: The Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections), not the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole), may make periodic review and revision of furlough plans a condition of individual furlough agreements. 37 A.G. Op. 82 (1977).

Applicant for Work Furlough Responsible for Locating Supervising Agency: Under former law, the applicant was responsible for locating an agency which would supervise his release on work furlough. 36 A.G. Op. 19 (1975).

Final Authority in Department: Under former law although the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) had the authority to release prisoners on furlough, the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) had final authority to approve or disapprove applications of prisoners for release on work furlough. 36 A.G. Op. 19 (1975).

When Application May Be Made for Work Furlough: A prisoner may apply for participation in the work furlough program at any time but he is not eligible for release on work furlough until he has completed half of the time required for eligibility for parole. 36 A.G. Op. 19 (1975).

2001 Amendment: Chapter 425 inserted (5) requiring initial appearance and hearing before at least one member of board if offense committed prior to March 20, 1989. Amendment effective April 30, 2001.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 546 in (1) substituted “board of pardons and parole” for “board of pardons”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1987 Amendment: In (2) substituted “monthly, and at such other times as the board considers necessary” for “at least twice each month”.

1981 Amendment: Inserted (4) authorizing interviews on parole eligibility, release plans, and revocation.

Case Notes

Improper Delegation of Hearing Responsibility to Parole Board Member — Right to Hearing Denied Absent Opportunity to Appear in Person Before Board: Haney sought immediate parole and release from the state prison on grounds that he was improperly denied parole after being allowed only a brief appearance before a hearings officer rather than the full Board of Pardons and Parole. The state contended that there is no statutory requirement that Haney be allowed a personal appearance before a majority of the Board and that Haney’s procedural rights were satisfied by the interview conducted by the hearings officer. The Supreme Court disagreed with the state’s position. The language of 46-23-202 clearly requires that before consideration of a prisoner’s application for parole, the Board must conduct a hearing at which statements from interested persons can be considered, and 46-23-202 clearly requires both a hearing and an interview of the prisoner. This section authorizes only delegation of the interview to a hearings officer, but the fact that the interviews may relate to parole eligibility does not eliminate the separate requirement in 46-23-202 for a hearing conducted by the Board. Thus, Haney was denied his statutory right to a hearing before the Board when the Board denied his parole without an opportunity to personally appear before the Board and when the hearing responsibility was delegated to the hearings officer. Although the Supreme Court declined to grant Haney his immediate freedom, the case was remanded to the Board for reconsideration of Haney’s parole application after providing him with an opportunity to appear in person and present witnesses on his behalf. (See also 2001 amendments requiring an initial appearance and hearing before at least one member of the Board if the offense was committed prior to March 20, 1989, and 2003 amendment.) Haney v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 201, 306 M 288, 32 P3d 1254 (2001).

Requirement That Parole Board Member With Knowledge of Native American Affairs Participate in Proceedings Regarding Native Americans: George, a Native American, contended that he was entitled to have the member of the Board of Pardons and Parole with knowledge in Native American affairs participate in his parole review. The state contended otherwise, pursuant to a plain reading of 2-15-2302, and asserted that had the Legislature intended to require participation by the particular Board member with knowledge in Native American affairs, it could have stated so directly or at least have required that the member with that knowledge be appointed as a regular Board member. The Supreme Court agreed with George. Cognizant of the role of the judge to examine the substance of statutes without inserting what has been omitted or omitting what has been inserted, the court agreed with the state that at least at first blush, 2-15-2302 does not appear to require that the member of the Board of Pardons and Parole with knowledge in Native American affairs participate in parole applications by Native Americans. However, the court could think of no other plausible reason for requiring such a member on the Board, so the court ruled that the parole board member with knowledge in Native American affairs is required to participate in parole applications by Native Americans and remanded George's case for de novo review with the full participation by that Board member. George v. Bd. of Pardons, 2001 MT 163, 306 M 115, 30 P3d 1065 (2001).

Due Process Rights of Inmate Regarding Preparole Interview — Presence of Sufficient Number of Board of Pardons and Parole Members Required: Under 46-23-107 (now repealed), decisions regarding an inmate's parole are to be made by a majority vote of the members of the Board of Pardons and Parole. As stated in Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822 (1996), to deny an inmate the opportunity to appear before those who will personally decide the merits of the parole application implicates the inmate's due process rights. In this case, only one member of the Board was present at West's parole hearing. West contended that he had a right to appear before the full Board and that a hearing before only one member violated his due process rights. The state argued that pursuant to the unpublished opinion of Radford v. Mahoney, No. 98-150 (July 1998) (unpublished), not all Board members are required to be present for the personal interview and that this section allows the Board to delegate the responsibility for parole eligibility interviews to one of its members. The state contended that having only one Board member present was permissible because the full Board ultimately participated in the decision to deny West's parole. The Supreme Court was unpersuaded by the state's argument, noting that the copy of the case disposition attached to West's habeas corpus petition was signed by only one Board member. The court found its order in Radford inconsistent with the Sage decision, and therefore unpersuasive. West's due process rights were no less implicated because West had the right to appear before one Board member when a majority vote of the Board was required for a decision. The court remanded to the Board with instructions to provide West with an opportunity to appear before a sufficient number of Board members so that those who decide his case will have done so based on a personal interview. (See 2001 and 2003 amendments.) West v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 82, 305 M 117, 22 P3d 201 (2001).

Prehearing Interview Not Substitute for Constitutional Right to Personal Appearance Before Parole Board: The Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) contended that under this section, its personal interview responsibility could be delegated to an appointed hearings officer, precluding the need for a parole applicant to appear personally before the Board. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting a parole applicant's due process right to appear before those entrusted with the subjective responsibility of passing judgment on the application. Therefore, under this section, the Board may designate one of its members, one of its staff members, or any other adult correctional releasing authority to conduct a prehearing interview with an inmate relative to parole eligibility to assist the Board and expedite the hearing process. However, the prehearing interview is not a substitute for the applicant's constitutional right to personally appear before the Board. (See 2001 amendment.) Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822, 53 St. Rep. 1234 (1996).

2023 Amendment: See 2023 Session Law for amendment made by sec. 1, Ch. 200, L. 2023. Amendment effective October 1, 2023.

2021 Amendment: Chapter 339 in (1)(c) at end substituted “correctional facility as defined in 41-5-103” for “youth correctional facility”. Amendment effective October 1, 2021.

2017 Amendment: Chapter 392 in (5) inserted “if the prisoner is confined for a sexual or violent offense, as defined in 46-23-502, or up to 1 year if the prisoner is confined for any other offense”; and deleted last sentence that read: “The board shall adopt by administrative rule a process by which a prisoner may request an earlier hearing or review.”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2017.

Applicability: Section 23, Ch. 392, L. 2017, provided: “[This act] applies to hearings conducted under Title 46, chapter 23, parts 2 or 3, and parole supervision and revocation hearings conducted under Title 46, chapter 23, part 10, on or after [the effective date of this section].” Effective July 1, 2017.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 198 in (1) near beginning substituted “subsections (2) through (4) and the parole criteria in 46-23-208” for “subsections (2) through (5) and when in the board’s opinion there is reasonable probability that a prisoner can be released without detriment to the prisoner or to the community”; deleted former (5) and (6) that read: “(5) A parole may be ordered under this section only for the best interests of society and not as an award of clemency or a reduction of sentence or pardon. A prisoner may be placed on parole only when the board believes that the prisoner is able and willing to fulfill the obligations of a law-abiding citizen.

(6) For a prisoner sentenced to be committed to the custody of the director of the department of public health and human services as provided in 46-14-312:

(a) the board may require as a condition of parole participation in a supervised mental health treatment program to ensure that the prisoner continues to treat the prisoner’s mental disorder; and

(b) parole may be revoked if a prisoner fails to comply with the terms of a supervised mental health treatment program described in subsection (6)(a), in which case the prisoner must be recommitted to the custody of the director of the department of public health and human services pursuant to 46-14-312”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2015.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 209 inserted (6) regarding a prisoner in the custody of the department of public health and human services, mental health treatment, and revocation of parole; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2013.

2011 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 102 inserted (1)(c) concerning a person who has been sentenced to prison as an adult pursuant to 41-5-206 and is confined in a youth correctional facility; in (2) substituted “granted a nonmedical parole” for “paroled”; inserted (6) allowing a panel to order up to 6 years of incarceration upon denial of parole and providing for rulemaking; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2011.

Chapter 176 in (1) near beginning inserted “and when in the board’s opinion there is reasonable probability that a prisoner can be released without detriment to the prisoner or to the community”; in (1)(a) after “prison” deleted “or the state hospital or any person who is”; in (1)(b) after “prerelease center” deleted “when in its opinion there is reasonable probability that the prisoner can be released without detriment to the prisoner or to the community”; inserted (1)(d) relating to persons sentenced to custody of director of department of public health and confined in certain state facilities; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

Style changes were slightly different in the chapters. In each case, the codifier chose appropriate text.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 17, Ch. 102, L. 2011, provided: “[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to applications made to the board on or before [the effective date of this act] and that are pending decision on [the effective date of this act].” Effective July 1, 2011.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 559 in (1) near beginning substituted reference to subsection (5) for reference to subsection (4) and after “prison” substituted “or the state hospital or any person who is sentenced to the state prison and confined in a prerelease center” for “except persons under sentence of death and persons serving sentences imposed under 46-18-202(2) or 46-18-219”; inserted (2) prohibiting the parole of persons under death sentence, persons placed by department in state prison for assessment or sanctioning, and persons serving sentences imposed under 46-18-202(2) or 46-18-219; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 13, Ch. 559, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 14, Ch. 559, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 491 in (1) near middle substituted “a state prison” for “the Montana state prison or the women’s prison”. Amendment effective April 27, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 189 in (1), after “women’s”, substituted “prison” for “correctional system”.

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 372 in (2), near middle after “at least”, substituted “one-fourth” for “one-half” and at end deleted “less the good time allowance provided for in 53-30-105. Except as provided in subsection (3), a prisoner designated as a nondangerous offender under 46-18-404 may be paroled after the prisoner has served one-quarter of the prisoner’s full term, less the good time allowance provided for in 53-30-105. Any prisoner serving a time sentence may be paroled after the prisoner has served 17½ years of the sentence”; deleted former (3) that read: “(3) A prisoner serving a time sentence under 45-9-109 may not be paroled until the prisoner has served at least one-half of the full term, less the good time allowance provided for in 53-30-105”; in (3), at end after “30 years”, deleted “less the good time allowance provided for in 53-30-105”; deleted (6) that read: “(6) Whenever the department of corrections and human services certifies to the board that the population at either the male or female correctional facility has exceeded its designed capacity for 30 consecutive days, the board shall consider the respective male or female prisoners under the jurisdiction of the department eligible for parole 120 days prior to the eligibility dates provided for in subsections (2) through (4)”; deleted (7) that read: “(7) Regardless of length of sentence, if the conditions of parole eligibility are met within the initial 12 months of incarceration, the provisions of subsection (6) do not apply”; and adjusted subsection references. Amendment effective April 12, 1995.

Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, in (1), near middle after “46-18-202(2)”, inserted “or 46-18-219”.

Chapter 546 in (1) substituted “women’s correctional system” for “women’s correctional center”; and in (6) substituted “department of corrections” for “department of corrections and human services”. Amendment effective July 1, 1995. The amendment in subsection (6) was rendered void by the amendment in Ch. 372.

Coordination Instruction — Effective Dates: Section 21, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: “(1) If House Bill No. 357 and [this act] [Senate Bill No. 66] are both passed and approved:

(a) [sections 1 through 18] of [this act] are effective July 1, 1997; and

(b) the sentencing commission shall include recommendations for implementing the public policy contained in [sections 1 through 18] of [this act].

(2) [Sections 19, 20, and this section] [enacted as codification and coordination instructions] are effective July 1, 1995.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void." House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, the amendments to 46-23-201, enacted as sec. 17 of Senate Bill No. 66, are effective July 1, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 10 in (1) substituted reference to the Women's Correctional Center for reference to the Women's Correction Center; in (7), after "incarceration", deleted "at Montana state prison"; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendments — Instructions to Code Commissioner: Chapter 248 in (1), near beginning before "parole", inserted "nonmedical"; and in (2), (4), and (5), near beginning, inserted "under this section".

The Code Commissioner changed "department of institutions" to "department of corrections and human services", pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 315 in (6), near beginning, substituted "either the male or female correctional facility has exceeded" for "the Montana state prison exceeds", near middle, after "capacity", deleted "of 744 by 96 inmates or that the population at the women's correction center exceeds its design capacity of 35 inmates and that the prison or the center has exceeded its capacity for a period of more than", after "30" inserted "consecutive", and near end, after "consider", substituted "the respective male or female inmates under the jurisdiction of the department" for "convicts in the institution in which the design capacity has been exceeded"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 519 in (2), after "except", substituted "as provided in subsection (3)" for "that"; inserted (3) requiring a person convicted of criminal sale of dangerous drugs on or near school property to serve at least one-half of full sentence less good time allowance prior to parole; in (6) and (7) changed internal reference; and made minor changes in style.

1989 Amendment: In (1), near beginning, substituted "Subject to the restrictions contained in subsections (2) through (4), the board may" for "Subject to the following restrictions, the board shall"; in (4), in two places, substituted "may" for "shall"; changed internal references; and made minor changes in outline form, style, and grammar. Amendment effective March 20, 1989.

1985 Amendment — Effective Date: In (3) increased design capacity of prison from 545 to 744 and reduced inmates in excess of capacity from 215 to 96.

Section 3(2), Ch. 451, L. 1985, provided that sec. 1 (1985 amendment to this section) is effective 30 days after the Governor declares by executive order that the prison housing units funded in HB 833 of the 48th Legislature are occupied.

1983 Amendment: In first paragraph of (1), inserted "or the women's correction center" and substituted "the prisoner" for "himself" near the end; and inserted (3), making convicts eligible for parole 120 days prior to the date in subsection (1) if the institution's inmate numbers exceed design capacity, and (4), providing that subsection (3) does not apply if an inmate is eligible for parole during the first 12 months at the prison, which were scheduled to terminate July 1, 1985, under sec. 2, Ch. 235, L. 1983. Section 2, Ch. 451, L. 1985, effective on passage and approval [approved April 12, 1985], repealed sec. 2, Ch. 235, L. 1983, which would have terminated (3) and (4).

Administrative Rules

ARM 20.25.305 Eligibility.

Case Notes

Parole Eligibility Restriction Inapplicable: After sentencing the defendant to three life sentences — two to run concurrently with each other and consecutive to the other life sentence — the District Court did not impose any parole restrictions. Rather, the court presumed that the defendant would not be parole eligible for 60 years pursuant to 46-23-201(4), which prevents a prisoner who is serving a life sentence from being parole eligible for 30 years. The defendant was 17 years old when he committed the offenses. Under 46-18-222, restrictions on parole eligibility do not apply if the offender was less than 18 years old at the time the offenses were committed. Under these circumstances, 46-18-222 takes precedence over the general parole restriction contained in 46-23-201. Citing St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087, and St. v. Petersen, 2011 MT 22, 359 Mont. 200, 247 P.3d 731, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded with an order to strike the illegal parole restriction from the defendant's written sentence. St. v. Olivares-Coster, 2011 MT 196, 361 Mont. 380, 259 P.3d 760.

Revocation of Parole or Probation Not Considered Punishment for Double Jeopardy Purposes: Revocation is a supervisory act involving the enforcement of conditions imposed on a term of parole or probation. Therefore, the same act or acts may form the basis for revoking both an offender's parole and an ensuing suspended sentence without contravening double jeopardy protections. Here, Haagenson was granted conditional release and a suspended sentence subject to certain conditions, including a requirement that he remain law abiding and not consume alcohol. Haagenson subsequently violated these conditions and thus forfeited both the conditional release and the future suspended sentence. St. v. Haagenson, 2010 MT 95, 356 Mont. 177, 232 P.3d 367, distinguishing St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 Mont. 394, 188 P.3d 1034, and St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 Mont. 93, 193 P.3d 925.

Dangerous Offender Designation as Part of Life Sentence Without Parole — No Error: Gratzner was sentenced to life without parole and contended that the sentencing court erred by also designating him a dangerous offender for all purposes. Gratzner argued that the designation cannot be applied to a life sentence because the only purpose for a dangerous offender designation is to affect a prisoner's parole eligibility. The Supreme Court held that the designation in this case had no effect on the time that Gratzner had to serve before becoming parole eligible because Gratzner's life sentence and ineligibility for parole precluded Gratzner from ever becoming eligible for parole, so no rights were violated by designating Gratzner as a dangerous offender for all purposes. Gratzner v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Life Sentence Without Parole Not Violative of Constitutional Rights: Gratzner asserted that the sentencing court exceeded its authority and violated the constitutional right to habeas corpus when the court sentenced Gratzner to life without the possibility of parole. Gratzner's argument was that use of the word "term" implied that there was a distinction between sentences imposed for a specific time and indeterminate life sentences and that the statutory sentencing scheme does not authorize a court to remove a prisoner's eligibility for parole if the prisoner is serving a life sentence. The Supreme Court declined to recognize the distinction. "Term" is used throughout the criminal code to refer to the duration of a sentence without any indication that it is meant to refer exclusively to determinate time sentences, and the language in 46-18-202 that allows a court to impose the parole eligibility exception applies equally to time sentences and life sentences. A sentence of imprisonment in the state prison for a term exceeding 1 year refers to all felonies, including those punishable by a life sentence, rather than a cryptic means of limiting a sentencing court's ability to restrict the parole eligibility of prisoners serving life sentences. The District Court did not violate Gratzner's rights, and the sentence of life without parole was affirmed. Gratzner v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Repeal of Dangerous Offender Statute Retroactively Applied: In 1995, the Legislature repealed 46-18-404, which required sentencing judges to determine whether an offender was dangerous or nondangerous for parole eligibility purposes. Parker was designated a dangerous offender for parole eligibility when initially sentenced in 1986, and when the District Court resentenced Parker in 1999 after his suspended sentence was revoked, he was again designated a dangerous offender, even though 46-18-404 had been repealed. The state conceded that the District Court had no authority to impose a dangerous offender designation in 1999 when the designation was repealed in 1995, but contended that the error was harmless because the District Court had the authority to provide the same result by restricting parole eligibility pursuant to 46-18-202. The Supreme Court disagreed. The proper remedy was to strike the portion of the sentence that was illegal and amend the judgment to that limited extent. Thus, the portion of the sentence designating Parker as a dangerous offender was vacated. St. v. Parker, 2002 MT 162, 310 M 418, 51 P3d 484 (2002).

Requirement That Parole Board Member With Knowledge of Native American Affairs Participate in Proceedings Regarding Native Americans: George, a Native American, contended that he was entitled to have the member of the Board of Pardons and Parole with knowledge in Native American affairs participate in his parole review. The state contended otherwise, pursuant to a plain reading of 2-15-2302, and asserted that had the Legislature intended to require participation by the particular Board member with knowledge in Native American affairs, it could have stated so directly or at least have required that the member with that knowledge be appointed as a regular Board member. The Supreme Court agreed with George. Cognizant of the role of the judge to examine the substance of statutes without inserting what has been omitted or omitting what has been inserted, the court agreed with the state that at least at first blush, 2-15-2302 does not appear to require that the member of the Board of Pardons and Parole with knowledge in Native American affairs participate in parole applications by Native Americans. However, the court could think of no other plausible reason for requiring such a member on the Board, so the court ruled that the parole board member with knowledge in Native American affairs is required to participate in parole applications by Native Americans and remanded George's case for de novo review with the full participation by that Board member. George v. Bd. of Pardons, 2001 MT 163, 306 M 115, 30 P3d 1065 (2001).

No Liberty Interest in Good Time Credits for Probationers — Credit for Time Served on Probation Properly Denied: McDermott pleaded guilty in early 1995 to issuing a bad check, felony common scheme, and received a 6-year deferred sentence and was placed on probation. After nearly 4 years on probation, McDermott had failed to comply with the conditions of probation, so the District Court revoked the deferred sentence and sentenced McDermott to 5 years at the state prison, specifying that no credit was allowed for time served while on probation or for good time. McDermott contended that he was improperly denied good time credit while on probation and that 53-30-105 (repealed 1995) violated equal protection guarantees because it granted good time credit for parolees but not probationers. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although it was held in Orozco v. Day, 281 M 341, 934 P2d 1009 (1997), that 53-30-105 created a liberty interest in good time credit for inmates, the court concluded that a similar liberty interest is not created for probationers. Because probationers are not statutorily entitled to good time credits and because the terms of probation are part of the sentence, the state's decision not to award good time credits during probation did not create an atypical and significant hardship or inevitably affect the duration of McDermott's sentence. McDermott had no protected liberty interest and was denied no process to which he was constitutionally entitled. Further, McDermott's argument that 53-30-105 violated equal protection by treating probationers differently than parolees also failed. Applying the rational basis test, the court concluded that the state has a legitimate interest in the disparate treatment of parolees and probationers regarding eligibility for sentence-reducing credits, including jurisdictional differences as well as penological interests. McDermott was properly credited with good time for the time that he was incarcerated and was properly denied credit for time spent on probation against his subsequent sentence. Thus, McDermott showed no constitutional basis for the claim that he was being illegally restrained, so his petitions for writs of habeas corpus and mandate were denied. McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001), followed in George v. Bd. of Pardons, 2001 MT 163, 306 M 115, 30 P3d 1065 (2001). See also St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817 (1984), and St. v. Nelson, 275 M 86, 910 P2d 247 (1996).

Authority to Condition Parole on Participation in Sexual Offender Program — Parole Considered Privilege, Not Right: McDermott pleaded guilty to four counts of assault and one count of bail-jumping in exchange for dismissal of four counts of incest and was sentenced to 30 years in prison. Because of the violent nature of the assaults and the fact that they were committed against young victims, the sentencing court found that McDermott was a substantial danger to society and designated him a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. When he began serving his sentence, an initial needs assessment concluded that he suffered from severe sexual problems and recommended participation in the prison sexual offender program (SOP). McDermott chose not to participate in the SOP, and the Board of Pardons and Parole later considered that fact during evaluations for placement in a prerelease center and for purposes of parole and inmate classification. The Board recommended that McDermott participate in the SOP to enhance success on parole. McDermott again declined to participate and, as a result, four points were added to his classification status for noncompliance with the Board's recommendation. McDermott then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus ordering his immediate release and rescinding the four points. McDermott argued that the Board did not have the authority to consider his lack of participation in the SOP as a basis for denying his early release on parole, citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished both Ommundson and Field, noting that under Montana and federal precedents, parole is a privilege, not a right. Because parole is granted as a matter of grace rather than right, the state may offer that grace under and subject to conditions that are considered most conducive to accomplish the desired purpose. Rather than restricting the Board's authority to set conditions precedent to parole, this section obligates the Board to ensure that no prisoner is released on parole who cannot meet the statutory criteria, and the Board may also consider factors that may not be considered by the District Court at trial and sentencing and evidence of offenses that were charged in dismissed counts. Even though McDermott was not a convicted sex offender, he did have four counts of incest dismissed and was identified as having severe sexual problems. Thus, his completion or lack of completion of the SOP was pertinent to his ability to be released without detriment to the community and to fulfill the obligations of a law-abiding citizen. The Board was well within its authority to consider McDermott's failure to enroll in the SOP when his petition for early release was denied. McDermott's petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001). See also Christopher v. U.S. Bd. of Pardons, 589 F2d 924 (7th Cir. 1978), and Robinson v. Hadden, 723 F2d 59 (10th Cir. 1983).

Due Process Standard Applicable to Parole Release Determination: Having determined that McDermott had a protected liberty interest in parole, the Supreme Court set out to determine whether McDermott's due process rights were protected when his application for parole was denied. There is no absolute standard for what constitutes due process. The requirements are flexible so that they may be adapted to meet the procedural protections demanded by a particular situation. The process due in any given case varies according to the factual circumstances, the nature of the interests at stake, and the risk of making an erroneous decision. A parole release determination is not subject to all the due process protections required to convict or confine, nor must a parole release determination provide the same protections that are required in a parole revocation hearing, which presents a much greater risk of error than a parole release determination because incarceration, whether as a result of conviction or parole revocation, involves a loss of liberty. On the other hand, denial of parole involves the loss of the mere anticipation of freedom to which a lawfully convicted inmate is not otherwise entitled. Thus, in the case of a prisoner seeking parole, due process is satisfied when the prisoner is, at a minimum, provided with an opportunity to be heard and a written statement explaining why parole was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001), following Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebr. Penal & Correction Complex, 442 US 1 (1979), and Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822 (1996).

Liberty Interest in Parole by Inmates Who Committed Offenses Prior to 1989 — Due Process Consideration: As a general rule, inmates have no liberty interest in parole. However, prior to amendment in 1989, this section required the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) to release on parole any prison inmate when the Board determined that there was a reasonable probability that the prisoner could be released without detriment to the prisoner or the community. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently held in Bd. of Pardons v. Allen, 482 US 369 (1987), that this mandatory statutory language created a liberty interest in parole that was protected by the federal constitutional due process clause. Although the mandatory language was removed in 1989, the Montana Supreme Court later held in Worden v. Bd. of Pardons & Parole, 1998 MT 168, 289 M 459, 962 P2d 1157 (1998), that inmates who committed offenses prior to 1989 continue to enjoy a federally protected liberty interest in parole. In the present case, McDermott committed his offenses in 1985 and 1986, so pursuant to Allen and Worden, his liberty interest in parole could not be denied without due process. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001).

Due Process Rights of Inmate Regarding Preparole Interview — Presence of Sufficient Number of Board of Pardons and Parole Members Required: Under 46-23-107 (now repealed), decisions regarding an inmate's parole are to be made by a majority vote of the members of the Board of Pardons and Parole. As stated in Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822 (1996), to deny an inmate the opportunity to appear before those who will personally decide the merits of the parole application implicates the inmate's due process rights. In this case, only one member of the Board was present at West's parole hearing. West contended that he had a right to appear before the full Board and that a hearing before only one member violated his due process rights. The state argued that pursuant to the unpublished opinion of Radford v. Mahoney, No. 98-150 (July 1998) (unpublished), not all Board members are required to be present for the personal interview and that 46-23-104 allows the Board to delegate the responsibility for parole eligibility interviews to one of its members. The state contended that having only one Board member present was permissible because the full Board ultimately participated in the decision to deny West's parole. The Supreme Court was unpersuaded by the state's argument, noting that the copy of the case disposition attached to West's habeas corpus petition was signed by only one Board member. The court found its order in Radford inconsistent with the Sage decision, and therefore unpersuasive. West's due process rights were no less implicated because West had the right to appear before one Board member when a majority vote of the Board was required for a decision. The court remanded to the Board with instructions to provide West with an opportunity to appear before a sufficient number of Board members so that those who decide his case will have done so based on a personal interview. West v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 82, 305 M 117, 22 P3d 201 (2001).

One-Quarter Time Provision Subject to Seventeen and One-Half-Year Provision: Under the 1978 version of this section, which provided that a nondangerous offender was eligible for parole after serving either one-quarter of the full term less good time or after serving 17½ years of the offender's full term, the Supreme Court held that the two conflicting conditions in the section must be read as establishing a general one-quarter less good time rule that is subject to the 17½-year outer limit on parole eligibility. Under that interpretation, an offender, who had already served over 20 years, became eligible for parole after serving 17½ years of his sentence. Case v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 324, 303 M 8, 15 P3d 884, 57 St. Rep. 1367 (2000).

Personal Appearance Before Parole Board — Subject Matter Jurisdiction to Determine Due Process Violation: Sage maintained that he had a right to due process, based on a liberty interest in parole pursuant to this section, that was violated by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) when it did not allow him to personally appear before the Board at a parole hearing. Further, Sage maintained that the District Court had subject matter jurisdiction to decide by writ of habeas corpus whether his due process rights had been violated. The Board asserted that Sage's alleged due process violations fell outside the parameters of habeas corpus relief and that the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to consider the issue. The Supreme Court held that the alleged deprivation of Sage's right to due process was directly related to whether the cause of his continued incarceration was legal, thus falling within the parameters of 46-22-101, and that the District Court therefore did have subject matter jurisdiction to determine whether the right to due process was violated. Pursuant to Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebr. Penal & Correctional Complex, 442 US 1 (1979), the opportunity of a parole applicant to appear before those entrusted with the subjective responsibility of passing judgment on the application is an important element of the due process to which the applicant is entitled. Based on the plain language of 46-23-202 and ARM 20.25.401, an inmate who is eligible for parole is clearly provided the right to personally appear at an interview "before the parole board" prior to the Board's decision to grant or deny the application for parole. Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822, 53 St. Rep. 1234 (1996).

Serving of One-Half Sentence Required Under 1978 Conviction: Burglary defendant argued that the District Court erred in 1978 when it failed to designate him as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for parole purposes, requiring him to serve one-half of his sentence, because he was never charged or sentenced as a dangerous offender. However, section 95-2206.16, R.C.M. 1947, the statute in effect at the time of sentencing, when read together with 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979), an Attorney General opinion interpreting that section, clearly requires defendant to serve one-half of his sentence before he is eligible for parole because he was not expressly designated a nondangerous offender, subsequent recodification and amendment of the section notwithstanding. Rose v. McCormick, 253 M 347, 834 P2d 1377, 49 St. Rep. 427 (1992).

Standing to Challenge Constitutionality of Weapon Enhancement and Dangerous Offender Statutes: To challenge the constitutionality of a criminal statute or procedure, the defendant must show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the law in question. The Supreme Court held that a defendant had standing to challenge both Montana's weapon enhancement statute and dangerous offender statute (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) because he faced direct injury to his liberty interests through application of those laws. St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990), followed, with regard to standing to challenge criminal restitution statutes, in St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Right of One Serving Consecutive Sentences to Annual Parole Review: This section clearly indicates that a person serving consecutive or concurrent multiple sentences is still eligible for parole and that if a second offense is committed while he is incarcerated, he is, under administrative rule, still entitled to annual review of eligibility for parole. Kelly v. Risley, 865 F2d 201 (9th Cir. 1989).

Liberty Interest in Parole: This section creates a protected liberty interest in parole because it uses the mandatory language that the Board "shall" parole a person under certain circumstances. Kelly v. Risley, 865 F2d 201 (9th Cir. 1989); Bd. of Pardons v. Allen, 107 S Ct 2415 (1987), affirming Allen v. Bd. of Pardons, 792 F2d 1404 (9th Cir. 1986).

Discretion to Grant Parole — Due Process: In Greenholtz v. Inmates of the Nebraska Penal and Correctional Complex, 47 U.S.L.W. 4581 (U.S. May 29, 1979) (No. 78-201), the U.S. Supreme Court held that unless a parole statute creates a legitimate entitlement to parole there is no requirement of due process protection. A mere hope is insufficient. In Montana, under 46-23-201, whether or not parole is granted is dependent entirely on the discretion of the parole board. Campbell v. Bd. of Pardons, 470 F. Supp. 1301 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

Erroneous Parole Revocation: Given the issue of whether a parolee who, after a full revocation hearing, had been found by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) not to have violated his parole could nevertheless be confined pending submission of an acceptable new parole plan, the Supreme Court held that the parolee must be released within 30 days from the decision and that the board was under a duty to develop and approve a parole plan within that period. Lopez v. Crist, 176 M 352, 578 P2d 312 (1978).

Credit for Time Served: Section 46-18-402 allows the sentencing authority to deny credit for good time earned while serving a prior modified or invalid sentence but does not authorize the sentencing authority to provide that credit for time previously served should not be considered in determining eligibility for parole. St. v. Zachmeier, 153 M 64, 453 P2d 783 (1969).

Attorney General's Opinions

Eligibility for Accelerated Parole-Release — Institutional Residence During Certification Required: A convict is entitled to accelerated parole-release eligibility under subsection (3) of this section only if he or she is actually residing within the Montana State Prison or the Women's Correction Center (now women's prison) during the effective period of certification. 42 A.G. Op. 72 (1988).

Prisoner Receives New Sentence: If a prisoner who has received a new consecutive sentence under 46-18-401(5) is paroled, the remaining time of his new and original sentences thereafter run concurrently. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Section 46-23-217 Impliedly Repealed: Section 46-23-217 was impliedly repealed by the enactment of 46-18-401(5). A sentence imposed regarding a crime committed after July 1, 1977, by a prisoner at the state prison or on parole or furlough runs consecutively with the remainder of the prisoner's original sentence. Any crime committed on or before July 1, 1977, by a prisoner while on parole or conditional release runs concurrently with the prisoner's original sentence unless otherwise specified by the sentencing court. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Persistent Felony Offenders: Designation of a prisoner as a "persistent felony offender" has no significance for parole eligibility with respect to sentences imposed for crimes occurring on or after July 1, 1977. However, for crimes committed between July 1, 1975, and June 30, 1977, inclusive, designated persistent felony offenders must serve one-third of their sentences before they are eligible for parole. 38 A.G. Op. 10 (1979).

Parole Eligibility: Subject to the exceptions set forth in 46-23-201, a prisoner who is sentenced to a time sentence for a crime committed on or after July 1, 1977, is ineligible for parole until he has served one-half of his full sentence, less good time, unless he has been expressly designated as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) by the sentencing court. 38 A.G. Op. 10 (1979).

Nondangerous Offender: A prisoner who has been expressly designated as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) is ineligible for parole until he has served one-quarter of his full sentence, less good time. 38 A.G. Op. 10 (1979).

Elimination or Delay of Parole Eligibility: A law that eliminates or delays a defendant's parole eligibility after the criminal offense has been committed is ex post facto as applied to that defendant. 38 A.G. Op. 10 (1979).

46-23-202. Initial parole hearing.

Compiler's Comments

2017 Amendment: Chapter 392 in second sentence substituted "the prisoner's score under the parole guidelines and other case-specific" for "all available". Amendment effective July 1, 2017.

Applicability: Section 23, Ch. 392, L. 2017, provided: "[This act] applies to hearings conducted under Title 46, chapter 23, parts 2 or 3, and parole supervision and revocation hearings conducted under Title 46, chapter 23, part 10, on or after [the effective date of this section]." Effective July 1, 2017.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 198 near end after "including" substituted "the criteria in 46-23-208" for "(1) the circumstances of the offense;

- (2) the prisoner's previous social history and criminal record;
- (3) the prisoner's conduct, employment, and attitude in prison;
- (4) the reports of any physical, psychological, and mental evaluations that have been made; and

- (5) written or oral statements from criminal justice authorities or any other interested person or the interested person's legal representative, including written or oral statements from a victim regarding the effects of the crime on the victim. A victim's statement may also include but is not limited to the circumstances surrounding the crime, the manner in which the crime was committed, and the victim's opinion as to whether the prisoner should be paroled. The victim's statement may be kept confidential"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2015.

2011 Amendment: Chapter 102 in (4) inserted "psychological" and substituted "mental evaluations" for "mental examinations"; in (5) inserted "criminal justice authorities"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2011.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 17, Ch. 102, L. 2011, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to applications made to the board on or before [the effective date of this act] and that are pending decision on [the effective date of this act]." Effective July 1, 2011.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 559 in first sentence after "possible" substituted "the department shall make the prisoner available for a hearing before a hearing panel" for "the prisoner shall make an initial appearance before the board or the board's designee as provided for in 46-23-104(4), except that if the offense was committed prior to March 20, 1989, the initial appearance must be before at least one member of the board"; in second sentence at beginning substituted "The hearing panel" for "The board" and after "all" inserted "available and"; inserted (5) requiring hearing panel to consider written and oral statements from interested person or interested person's legal representative, allowing statement to include circumstances surrounding crime, manner of crime, and victim's opinion on parole, and allowing victim's statement to be confidential; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) Before a prisoner may be paroled, the board or its designee shall:

(a) conduct a hearing and interview the prisoner, except that if the offense was committed prior to March 20, 1989, the hearing must be before at least one member of the board. At the time of the hearing, the board or its designee must receive relevant statements from interested persons and any person may be represented by counsel. The board has the power to regulate procedures at all hearings.

(b) permit a victim to present a statement concerning the effects of the crime on the victim, the circumstances surrounding the crime, the manner in which the crime was perpetrated, and the victim's opinion regarding whether the prisoner should be paroled. In the board's discretion, the victim's statement may be kept confidential. The board shall consider the victim's statement, along with the information provided under subsection (1), in determining whether to grant parole"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 13, Ch. 559, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 14, Ch. 559, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 425 in (1) at end of first sentence inserted reference to board's designee and exception clause; in (2) inserted reference to board's designee; in (2)(a) at end of first sentence inserted exception clause and near middle of second sentence inserted reference to board's designee; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 30, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 450 in (1) at end of first sentence inserted "or as soon thereafter as possible, the prisoner shall make an initial appearance before the board"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 22, 1999.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 125 in (2) substituted current (2)(a) requiring Board to conduct hearing and receive relevant statements from interested persons for "interview the prisoner"; inserted (2)(b) requiring Board to receive and consider victim's statement; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 372 in (1), near beginning after "date", deleted "or within 2 months following the date a prisoner becomes eligible pursuant to 53-30-105(5)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 12, 1995.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 579 in (1), new beginning, inserted "or within the 2 months following the date a prisoner becomes eligible pursuant to 53-30-105(5)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1993.

1983 Amendment: In (1), changed Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) consideration from 2 months after admission and at such intervals thereafter as the board determined to 2 months prior to official parole eligibility date.

Administrative Rules

ARM 20.25.504 Investigation.

Case Notes

Right to Counsel at Parole Hearing — Writ of Habeas Corpus Proper Vehicle for Review of Parole Board's Denial of Legal Representation: By writ of habeas corpus, Carson contended that the Department of Corrections unconstitutionally denied him the right to legal representation at a hearing before the Board of Pardons and Parole. The state maintained that Carson was required to exhaust administrative appeals before the District Court could review the Board's denial of Carson's request for representation. The District Court concurred and denied the petition, but on appeal the Supreme Court disagreed. To require exhaustion of administrative appeals with regard to the right of representation at parole hearings would defeat the purpose for which habeas corpus exists by requiring an unlawfully held inmate to first seek relief from the very institution by which he alleges that he is being unlawfully held—a course of action not contemplated by constitutional or statutory law. Therefore, a writ of habeas corpus was the appropriate vehicle for Carson to seek review. Under this section, a person appearing before the Board has a right to counsel, and the state was unable to cite any qualifying regulation to the contrary. Thus, the Supreme Court granted Carson's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and remanded to the Department of Corrections for a new parole hearing, expeditiously scheduled, with Carson's attorney in attendance. St. v. Carson, 2002 MT 234, 311 M 485, 56 P3d 844 (2002).

Improper Delegation of Hearing Responsibility to Parole Board Member — Right to Hearing Denied Absent Opportunity to Appear in Person Before Board: Haney sought immediate parole and release from the state prison on grounds that he was improperly denied parole after being allowed only a brief appearance before a hearings officer rather than the full Board of Pardons and Parole. The state contended that there is no statutory requirement that Haney be allowed a personal appearance before a majority of the Board and that Haney's procedural rights were satisfied by the interview conducted by the hearings officer. The Supreme Court disagreed with the state's position. The language of this section clearly requires that before consideration of a prisoner's application for parole, the Board must conduct a hearing at which statements from interested persons can be considered, and this section clearly requires both a hearing and an interview of the prisoner. Section 46-23-104 authorizes only delegation of the interview to a hearings officer, but the fact that the interviews may relate to parole eligibility does not eliminate the separate requirement in this section for a hearing conducted by the Board. Thus, Haney was denied his statutory right to a hearing before the Board when the Board denied his parole without an opportunity to personally appear before the Board and when the hearing responsibility was delegated to the hearings officer. Although the Supreme Court declined to grant Haney his immediate freedom, the case was remanded to the Board for reconsideration of Haney's parole application after providing him with an opportunity to appear in person and present witnesses on his behalf. (See 2001 amendments requiring an initial appearance and hearing before at least one member of the Board if the offense was committed prior to March 20, 1989, and 2003 amendment.) Haney v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 201, 306 M 288, 32 P3d 1254 (2001).

Authority to Condition Parole on Participation in Sexual Offender Program — Parole Considered Privilege, Not Right: McDermott pleaded guilty to four counts of assault and one count of bail-jumping in exchange for dismissal of four counts of incest and was sentenced to 30 years in prison. Because of the violent nature of the assaults and the fact that they were committed against young victims, the sentencing court found that McDermott was a substantial danger to society and designated him a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. When he began serving his sentence, an initial needs assessment concluded that he suffered from severe sexual problems and recommended participation in the prison sexual offender program (SOP). McDermott chose not to participate in the SOP, and the Board of Pardons and Parole later considered that fact during evaluations for placement in a prerelease center and for purposes of parole and inmate classification. The Board recommended that McDermott participate in the SOP to enhance success on parole. McDermott again declined to participate and, as a result, four points were added to his classification status for noncompliance with the Board's recommendation. McDermott then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus ordering his immediate release and rescinding the four points. McDermott argued that the Board did not have the authority to consider his lack of participation in the SOP as a basis for denying his early release on parole, citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished both Ommundson and Field, noting that under Montana and federal precedents, parole is a privilege, not a right. Because parole is granted as a matter of grace rather than right, the state may offer that grace under and subject to conditions that are considered most conducive to accomplish the desired purpose. Rather than restricting the Board's authority to set conditions precedent to parole, 46-23-201 obligates the Board to ensure that no prisoner is released on parole who cannot meet the statutory criteria, and the Board may also consider factors that may not be considered by the District Court at trial and sentencing and evidence of offenses that were charged in dismissed counts. Even though McDermott was not a convicted sex offender, he did have four counts of incest dismissed and was identified as having severe sexual problems. Thus, his completion or lack of completion of the SOP was pertinent to his ability to be released without detriment to the community and to fulfill the obligations of a law-abiding citizen. The Board was well within its authority to consider McDermott's failure to enroll in the SOP when his petition for early release was denied. McDermott's petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001). See also Christopher v. U.S. Bd. of Pardons, 589 F2d 924 (7th Cir. 1978), and Robinson v. Hadden, 723 F2d 59 (10th Cir. 1983).

Due Process Rights of Inmate Regarding Preparole Interview — Presence of Sufficient Number of Board of Pardons and Parole Members Required: Under 46-23-107 (now repealed), decisions regarding an inmate's parole are to be made by a majority vote of the members of the Board of Pardons and Parole. As stated in Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822 (1996), to deny an inmate the opportunity to appear before those who will personally decide the merits of the parole application implicates the inmate's due process rights. In this case, only one member of the Board was present at West's parole hearing. West contended that he had a right to appear before the full Board and that a hearing before only one member violated his due process rights. The state argued that pursuant to the unpublished opinion of Radford v. Mahoney, No. 98-150 (July 1998) (unpublished), not all Board members are required to be present for the personal interview and that 46-23-104 allows the Board to delegate the responsibility for parole eligibility interviews to one of its members. The state contended that having only one Board member present was permissible because the full Board ultimately participated in the decision to deny West's parole. The Supreme Court was unpersuaded by the state's argument, noting that the copy of the case disposition attached to West's habeas corpus petition was signed by only one Board member. The court found its order in Radford inconsistent with the Sage decision, and therefore unpersuasive. West's due process rights were no less implicated because West had the right to appear before one Board member when a majority vote of the Board was required for a decision. The court remanded to the Board with instructions to provide West with an opportunity to appear before a sufficient number of Board members so that those who decide his case will have done so based on a personal interview. West v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 82, 305 M 117, 22 P3d 201 (2001).

Prehearing Interview Not Substitute for Constitutional Right to Personal Appearance Before Parole Board: The Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) contended that under 46-23-104, its personal interview responsibility could be delegated to an appointed hearings officer, precluding the need for a parole applicant to appear personally before the Board. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting a parole applicant's due process right to appear before those entrusted with the subjective responsibility of passing judgment on the application. Therefore, under 46-23-104, the Board may designate one of its members, one of its staff members, or any other adult correctional releasing authority to conduct a prehearing interview with an inmate relative to parole eligibility to assist the Board and expedite the hearing process. However, the prehearing interview is not a substitute for the applicant's constitutional right to personally appear before the Board. (See 2001 and 2003 amendments.) Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822, 53 St. Rep. 1234 (1996).

Case Notes

No Duty of Department to Inform Board of Prisoner's Marijuana Violation: The parole board (now Board of Pardons and Parole) released a prisoner who subsequently shot the plaintiff. The plaintiff argued that the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) should have informed the Board of the prisoner's use of marijuana because then the Board would not have paroled him at that time and the shooting would never have occurred. The Supreme Court held that the Department had no statutory duty to inform the Board of the marijuana infraction. Kiger v. St., 245 M 457, 802 P2d 1248, 47 St. Rep. 2206 (1990).

Case Notes

Furlough Considered “Official Detention”: The defendant was placed at a prerelease facility and was released on furlough with a scheduled return date. The defendant failed to return and was charged with escape pursuant to 45-7-306. The defendant moved to dismiss the escape charge on the basis that he was not in “official detention” while on furlough or, alternatively, that furlough should be considered parole and, therefore, exempt from the definition of “official detention”. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court’s denial of the motion to dismiss, concluding that under the language of 45-7-306, which the legislature amended in 1997, the defendant remained in “official detention” while on furlough. In addition, citing St. v. Romannose, 281 Mont. 84, 931 P.2d 1304 (1996), the Supreme Court rejected the defendant’s argument that furlough should be considered parole, as distinctions exist between the two. St. v. Roundstone, 2011 MT 227, 362 Mont. 74, 261 P.3d 1009.

Failure to Complete Prison Sex Offender Program Not Because of Defendant’s Willful Conduct — Consideration of Incarceration Alternatives Constitutionally Required: Lee was sentenced to two concurrent 40-year terms in prison for sexual intercourse without consent and attempted sexual intercourse without consent and was ineligible for parole during the first 10 years of the sentence unless a sex offender treatment plan was successfully completed. Lee entered prison in 1995 and immediately requested enrollment in Phase I of the two-phase program. Lee was finally enrolled in Phase I after a 3-year wait, successfully completed that phase, and was placed on a waiting list for enrollment in Phase II. Because of a sitdown strike, Lee was unable to complete Phase II by his scheduled release date. The state petitioned to revoke Lee’s suspended sentence because the program was not completed, and Lee moved to dismiss on grounds that the failure to complete treatment was not his fault. The District Court found that Lee’s failure to complete the program was not due to any volitional conduct on Lee’s part, but the court nevertheless determined that the failure constituted a violation of the terms of the suspended sentence and ordered Lee to serve the remaining 30 years on each count, declaring Lee ineligible for parole until both phases of treatment were completed. Lee appealed on grounds that the court violated his right to due process because it was impossible to complete the program during incarceration because of prison waiting periods and the length of the program. The Supreme Court agreed. In St. v. Williams, 1999 MT 240, 296 M 258, 993 P2d 1 (1999), it was held that a court could revoke a suspended sentence even though a probationer’s failure to comply with the terms of the sentence was not willful, and the court in this case affirmed Williams to the extent that violations of nonfinancial probationary conditions need not necessarily be willful in order to justify revocation. However, the probationer in Williams was unable to gain acceptance into sex offender programs because of a lack of social skills, immaturity, and “acting out” behavior, whereas Lee was unable to access the programs because of actions of the state. Due process required the trial court to consider whether there were alternatives to incarceration that would further the purpose of Lee’s suspended sentence. The Supreme Court remanded for a determination of whether there were any reasonable alternative measures other than continued incarceration because to do otherwise would deprive Lee of his conditional freedom simply because the state prevented him from completing the sex offender program while imprisoned. St. v. Lee, 2001 MT 176, 306 M 173, 31 P3d 998 (2001), distinguished in St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

Authority to Condition Parole on Participation in Sexual Offender Program — Parole Considered Privilege, Not Right: McDermott pleaded guilty to four counts of assault and one count of bail-jumping in exchange for dismissal of four counts of incest and was sentenced to 30 years in prison. Because of the violent nature of the assaults and the fact that they were committed against young victims, the sentencing court found that McDermott was a substantial danger to society and designated him a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. When he began serving his sentence, an initial needs assessment concluded that he suffered from severe sexual problems and recommended participation in the prison sexual offender program (SOP). McDermott chose not to participate in the SOP, and the Board of Pardons and Parole later considered that fact during evaluations for placement in a prerelease center and for purposes of parole and inmate classification. The Board recommended that McDermott participate in the SOP to enhance success on parole. McDermott again declined to participate and, as a result, four points were added to his classification status for noncompliance with the Board's recommendation. McDermott then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus ordering his immediate release and rescinding the four points. McDermott argued that the Board did not have the authority to consider his lack of participation in the SOP as a basis for denying his early release on parole, citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished both Ommundson and Field, noting that under Montana and federal precedents, parole is a privilege, not a right. Because parole is granted as a matter of grace rather than right, the state may offer that grace under and subject to conditions that are considered most conducive to accomplish the desired purpose. Rather than restricting the Board's authority to set conditions precedent to parole, 46-23-201 obligates the Board to ensure that no prisoner is released on parole who cannot meet the statutory criteria, and the Board may also consider factors that may not be considered by the District Court at trial and sentencing and evidence of offenses that were charged in dismissed counts. Even though McDermott was not a convicted sex offender, he did have four counts of incest dismissed and was identified as having severe sexual problems. Thus, his completion or lack of completion of the SOP was pertinent to his ability to be released without detriment to the community and to fulfill the obligations of a law-abiding citizen. The Board was well within its authority to consider McDermott's failure to enroll in the SOP when his petition for early release was denied. McDermott's petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001). See also Christopher v. U.S. Bd. of Pardons, 589 F2d 924 (7th Cir. 1978), and Robinson v. Hadden, 723 F2d 59 (10th Cir. 1983).

Due Process Standard Applicable to Parole Release Determination: Having determined that McDermott had a protected liberty interest in parole, the Supreme Court set out to determine whether McDermott's due process rights were protected when his application for parole was denied. There is no absolute standard for what constitutes due process. The requirements are flexible so that they may be adapted to meet the procedural protections demanded by a particular situation. The process due in any given case varies according to the factual circumstances, the nature of the interests at stake, and the risk of making an erroneous decision. A parole release determination is not subject to all the due process protections required to convict or confine, nor must a parole release determination provide the same protections that are required in a parole revocation hearing, which presents a much greater risk of error than a parole release determination because incarceration, whether as a result of conviction or parole revocation, involves a loss of liberty. On the other hand, denial of parole involves the loss of the mere anticipation of freedom to which a lawfully convicted inmate is not otherwise entitled. Thus, in the case of a prisoner seeking parole, due process is satisfied when the prisoner is, at a minimum, provided with an opportunity to be heard and a written statement explaining why parole was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001), following Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebr. Penal & Correction Complex, 442 US 1 (1979), and Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822 (1996).

Parole Officer Duty of Care to Supervise Parolees — Jury Instruction Properly Given: Corliss was paroled, after serving time for an execution-style slaying with a handgun, under the condition that he not possess a firearm. While on a visit, with the approval of his parole officer, to Washington state to look for work, Corliss failed to return to Montana within the established time, failed to see a parole officer in Washington, had a temporary restraining order obtained against him by a girlfriend because of threats made to her and her family, and had an altercation with his wife involving a handgun. In neither instance of violence did Corliss's parole officer investigate the circumstances of the violence. Later, Corliss shot and killed one friend of his girlfriend and injured another. Both the estates of the deceased woman and the wounded woman brought actions against the state for negligent supervision of Corliss's parole. The state objected to an instruction given by the District Court concerning a parole officer's duty of care, claiming that there must be some special relationship between the parole officer and the person injured by a parolee in order for a duty of care to arise. The Supreme Court reviewed statutes defining negligence, statutes describing the general duty of one individual toward another, and statutes concerning parole and concluded that Robbins had a general duty to exercise reasonable care in the supervision of Corliss and had a duty to the killed and injured women in particular. Starkenburg v. St., 282 M 1, 934 P2d 1018, 54 St. Rep. 214 (1997). See also Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081, 56 St. Rep. 771 (1999).

Racial Bias of Judge Who Illegally Made Deportation Condition of Parole Not Shown by Mere Unsupported Speculation: Upon an aggravated kidnapping and assault conviction of a native of Bangladesh, the court ordered deportation as a condition of parole. This was an illegal condition but did not alone show the judge was racially biased against defendant. A claim of bias was not upheld when it was supported by mere speculation or conjecture by defendant. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Supervised Release Program Not Inclusive of Furloughs — Escape Not Chargeable to Furloughed Convict: Roberts was released from the state prison into the parole-related furlough program rather than the supervised release program and did not meet the requirements of the administrative rules governing the supervised release program. A part of Roberts' parole included a 10-day furlough to allow him to find housing and employment. When he failed to meet his parole officer on a specified date, he was charged with felony escape. Roberts moved to dismiss the charge. An escape charge can be maintained only against a person subject to official detention, which is defined in part as supervision under a supervised release program. The term "supervised release program" clearly and unambiguously refers to the program codified in Title 46, ch. 23, part 4 (now repealed), and not to the furlough associated with parole proceedings under this section. Because Roberts was not being supervised under a supervised release program, the District Court erred in concluding that Roberts could be prosecuted for escape and in denying his motion to dismiss the escape charge. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded with instructions to enter an order of dismissal. St. v. Roberts, 275 M 365, 912 P2d 812, 53 St. Rep. 181 (1996). See also St. v. Roundstone, 2011 MT 227, 362 Mont. 74, 261 P.3d 1009.

Alcoholics — Refraining as Valid Condition of Parole: One who, because of addiction or character disorder, is unable to control his excessive drinking of alcoholic beverages has no constitutional or statutory right to release free from limitations on his use of alcohol, either on parole or pursuant to a suspended sentence. There was no merit to appellant's contention that it was vindictive and unreasonable or illegal to require him, an acknowledged alcoholic, to refrain from drinking as a condition of his probation or parole. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed, with regard to the requirement for nexus between the sentencing limitation or condition and the underlying offense, in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Parole Conditions — Application to Suspended Portion of Sentence: Parole conditions set by Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) also applied to period of suspended sentence where court passing sentence did not set conditions upon suspended portion of sentence, particularly where that court expressly directed that when defendant was not in prison he was to be under the supervision of the Board and court could revoke the suspended sentence for violation of those conditions. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Erroneous Parole Revocation: Given the issue of whether a parolee who, after a full revocation hearing, had been found by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) not to have violated his parole could nevertheless be confined pending submission of an acceptable new parole plan, the Supreme Court held that the parolee must be released within 30 days from the decision and that the Board was under a duty to develop and approve a parole plan within that period. Lopez v. Crist, 176 M 352, 578 P2d 312 (1978).

Parole to Out-of-State Prison: Prisoner who had been sentenced concurrently in Wyoming and in Montana could not be released on parole from the Montana prison since the Wyoming sentence provided that if the duration of the Wyoming sentence had not expired at the time of defendant's release from the Montana prison then the prisoner should be returned to Wyoming. Petition of Glover, 166 M 546, 539 P2d 721 (1975).

Case Notes

Good Time Held Applicable to Parolees: Where the petitioners sought Writs of Habeas Corpus to release them from prison on the basis of good time earned while on parole, the trial court correctly held that parolees could be credited with good time under 53-30-105 (now repealed) while on parole. Following rules of statutory construction, the court concluded that it was the intention of the Legislature to grant parolees good time for time served on parole and that the language of 53-30-105 (now repealed) did not act as a saving clause to apply that section only to inmates convicted prior to April 1, 1955. Crist v. Segna, 191 M 210, 622 P2d 1028, 38 St. Rep. 150 (1981).

1999 Amendment: Chapter 491 in first sentence near beginning substituted "a state prison" for "the state prison". Amendment effective April 27, 1999.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 372 at end of first and second sentences, after "sentence", deleted "as provided in 46-18-401". Amendment effective April 12, 1995.

1989 Amendment: In first sentence substituted "while imprisoned in the state prison or while released on parole or under the supervised release program" for "while at large on parole or conditional release"; inserted last two sentences relating to parole for original sentence; and made minor changes in phraseology. Amendment effective March 20, 1989.

Case Notes

Good Time Earned While Serving One Sentence Not Applicable to Later Sentence: In 1970, petitioner was convicted of burglary and sentenced to 10 years in the Montana State Prison. He was released on parole in 1971. In 1976, he was returned to the Montana State Prison after being convicted on another burglary charge. Subsequently his parole was revoked. During the time petitioner was on parole, good time could be earned under 53-30-105 (now repealed) by a parolee. Under a 1981 amendment to that section, this is no longer possible. In 1982, petitioner filed a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, claiming that the good time he earned while on parole should be applied to reduce the discharge date of his second sentence, as the second sentence had been merged (under 46-23-217, prior to amendment) with the first sentence. The Supreme Court ruled that the sentences ran concurrently but were not merged and that therefore any good time petitioner earned while on parole on his first sentence may be applied only to the first sentence. Bagley v. Risley, 207 M 121, 672 P2d 1126, 40 St. Rep. 1937 (1983).

Inconsistent Statutes: When two statutes are wholly inconsistent, incompatible, and incapable of being reconciled, the later statute impliedly repeals the earlier one if it does not expressly do so. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Prisoner Receives New Sentence: If a prisoner who has received a new consecutive sentence under 46-18-401(5) is paroled, the remaining time of his new and original sentences thereafter run concurrently. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Section 46-23-217 Impliedly Repealed: Section 46-23-217 was impliedly repealed by the enactment of 46-18-401(5). A sentence imposed regarding a crime committed after July 1, 1977, by a prisoner at the state prison or on parole or furlough runs consecutively with the remainder of the prisoner's original sentence. Any crime committed on or before July 1, 1977, by a prisoner while on parole or conditional release runs concurrently with the prisoner's original sentence unless otherwise specified by the sentencing court. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Case Notes

No Due Process Violation From Parole Board Using Unadopted Guidelines in Parole Hearing When Defendant Appeared in Person and Received Copy of Decision: The appellant was convicted of deliberate homicide. The sentencing court provided that he would be ineligible for parole for the first 24 years of his sentence and that prior to being released on parole he was required to undergo a psychological evaluation to confirm that he would not pose a safety risk. He appeared before the Montana Board of Pardons and Parole in 2015 and again in 2018 and was denied parole both times. He appealed the Board's 2018 decision to the District Court on the grounds that his due process rights had been violated by (1) the Board's use of parole guidelines that were required to be promulgated pursuant to 46-23-218 but that had not yet been adopted through the rulemaking process and (2) the Board's failure to provide him with the guidelines, statements, and testimony provided by the victims' family members or a copy of the mental health evaluation contained in his file. On the matter of the guidelines, the District Court found, and the Supreme Court affirmed, that the appellant's rights had not been violated because the guidelines did not materially affect the Board's decision and even if they had been adopted in rule it would not have changed the outcome of the hearing. As for the failure to provide information, the District Court found that the Board had no obligation to provide the guidelines or family testimony. Additionally, the Board's failure to provide a copy of the old mental health evaluation could not have affected the outcome of the hearing because it was outdated and would not have satisfied the requirement of determining the appellant's present risk to society. Noting finally that parole is a privilege and not a right, the District Court concluded that the only process the appellant was due was the opportunity to appear at the hearing and a copy of the Board's written decision, both of which were satisfied. The Supreme Court affirmed. Miller v. St., 2020 MT 318, 402 Mont. 337, 477 P.3d 1107.

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), and *St. v. Compiler's Comments

2015 Amendment: Chapter 96 inserted (3)(b) concerning applications transmitted to governor when hearing panel does not favor hearing by majority vote; in (4) after first sentence deleted "In noncapital cases, if the hearing panel recommends that clemency be denied, the application may not be forwarded to the governor and the governor may not take action on the case. In capital cases" and near end after "final authority to grant or deny clemency" deleted "in those cases forwarded to the governor"; inserted (5) concerning restrictions on hearing panel's ability to recommend clemency and governor's ability to grant clemency; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2015.

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 96, L. 2015, provided: "[This act] applies to applications filed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2015.

2011 Amendment: Chapter 102 in (2) in last sentence substituted "After a hearing panel has considered an application for executive clemency and has by majority vote favored a hearing, the hearing panel" for "The board"; inserted (2)(b) regarding an applicant's criminal record; in (3) at beginning deleted "The board shall advise the governor and recommend action to be taken" and in five places substituted reference to hearing panel for reference to board; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2011.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 17, Ch. 102, L. 2011, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to applications made to the board on or before [the effective date of this act] and that are pending decision on [the effective date of this act]." Effective July 1, 2011.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 92 in (2), in first sentence after "clemency", inserted exception clause prohibiting filing of application for clemency while automatic review proceeding is pending before the Montana Supreme Court and inserted third sentence requiring the filing of an executive clemency application with the Board no later than 10 days after set date of execution; inserted last sentence in (3) prohibiting the appeal of Governor's decision to grant or deny clemency; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 19, 1997.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 92, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [46-19-103 and 46-23-301] applies to death warrants issued by a court on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 19, 1997.

1989 Amendment: Inserted (1)(a) defining clemency; inserted (1)(b) defining pardon; and substituted (2) and (3) relating to procedure for applying for clemency for former language that read: "The board shall investigate and report to the governor with respect to all cases of executive clemency. A majority of the board shall advise, investigate, and approve each such case before the action of the governor shall be final. All applications for executive clemency shall be made to the board, which shall cause an investigation to be made of all the circumstances surrounding the crime for which the applicant was convicted and as to the individual circumstances relating to social conditions of the applicant. If the board or a majority thereof approves such application for executive clemency, it shall advise the governor and recommend action to be taken." Amendment effective April 15, 1989.

Part 5Registration of Sexual and Violent Offenders*Part Compiler's Comments

Retroactive Applicability: Section 1, Ch. 152, L. 2001, amended sec. 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, to read: "Section 18. Retroactive applicability. The provisions of Title 46, chapter 23, part 5, and of [this act] relating to registration apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced by a state or federal court in any state on or after July 1, 1989, or who as a result of a sentence are under the supervision of a county, state, or federal agency in any state on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced by a state or federal court in any state on or after October 1, 1995, or who as a result of a sentence are under the supervision of a county, state, or federal agency in any state on or after October 1, 1995." Amendment effective March 29, 2001.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that the danger of recidivism posed by sexual and violent offenders and the protection of the public from these offenders is of paramount concern to government and the people; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature further finds that law enforcement agencies' efforts to protect their communities, conduct investigations, and apprehend sexual and violent offenders is impaired by the lack of information about offenders who live within their jurisdictions; and

WHEREAS, the system of registering sexual and violent offenders provides law enforcement with information critical to preventing victimization and to resolving incidents of sexual or violent offenses promptly, including notification of the public when necessary to the continued protection of the community; and

WHEREAS, persons who have committed a sexual or violent offense have a reduced expectation of privacy because of the public's interest in safety; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that releasing information about sexual or violent offenders to law enforcement agencies and, under certain circumstances, providing access to limited information about certain sexual offenders to the general public will further the primary governmental interest of protecting specific vulnerable groups and the public in general from potential harm.

THEREFORE, it is the policy of the State of Montana to assist local law enforcement agencies' efforts in protecting their communities by requiring that sexual or violent offenders register and to authorize the release of necessary and relevant information about sex offenders to the public."

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance for rules adopted under [section 12] [46-23-509] concerning the qualifications of sexual offender evaluators and concerning evaluations of sexual offenders. The legislature intends that sexual offender evaluators possess education and experience similar to the education and experience requirements of therapists certified by the Montana sex offender treatment association. The legislature further intends that rules for evaluating the risk of repeat offenses by sexual offenders include the following factors:

- (1) whether the sexual offender has a mental abnormality;
- (2) whether the sexual offender's conduct is repetitive and compulsive;
- (3) whether drugs or alcohol played a part in the offense or offenses;
- (4) whether the sexual offender served the maximum term for the offense or offenses;
- (5) whether the offense or offenses involved a child;
- (6) the age of the sexual offender at the commission of the offense or offenses;
- (7) the relationship between the sexual offender and the victim or victims;
- (8) whether the offense or offenses involved use of a weapon;
- (9) the number, date, and nature of prior offenses;
- (10) conditions of release that minimize risk of another offense, including whether the sexual offender is under supervision or receiving counseling and treatment;
- (11) physical conditions that minimize the risk of another offense, such as advanced age or debilitating illness of the sexual offender;
- (12) whether psychological or psychiatric profiles of the sexual offender indicate a risk of recidivism;
- (13) the sexual offender's response to and participation in treatment;
- (14) recent behavior of the sexual offender;
- (15) recent threats or gestures by the sexual offender against persons; and
- (16) a review of any victim impact statements."

Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act Changes Since 2007 Punitive — Onerous, Lifelong Restraints Significantly Hinder Liberty and Deprive Privacy of Registrants — Law Cannot Apply Retroactively Under Ex Post Facto Clause. St. v. Hinman, 2023 MT 116, 412 Mont. 434, 530 P.3d 1271.

Violent Offender Registration and Disclosure Requirements Not Violative of Privacy or Right of Convicted to Restoration of Rights: The defendant was convicted of arson and received a 4-year suspended sentence. In addition, the sentencing court required him to register as a violent offender for at least 10 years. The defendant appealed the registration requirement. Similar to the defendant in Mount, he argued that the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act, as applied to a violent offender, violated his right to privacy. The Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that the state has a compelling state interest to protect the public and that the Act is narrowly tailored to achieve that interest. St. v. Brooks, 2012 MT 263, 367 Mont. 59, 289 P.3d 105, following St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 Mont. 481, 78 P.3d 829.

Failure of Trial Court to Address Issues Raised in Defendant's Pro Se Petition — Reversible Error: After being charged with failure to register as a sexual offender, Samples was granted the opportunity to file a pretrial pro se petition addressing the ex post facto application of Title 46, ch. 23, part 5, as well as a variety of other constitutional challenges to the sexual offender registration law. The District Court substantively discussed and rejected Samples' ex post facto argument, refused to discuss the other constitutional concerns, and denied the petition. Following denial of the petition, Samples pleaded guilty, but reserved the right to appeal the ruling on the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, even though the District Court could have refused to allow the pro se motion, once the District Court expressly authorized Samples to file a pro se motion challenging the constitutionality of the sexual offender registration law, the court was obligated to address the constitutional issues raised in the petition. Failure of the District Court to consider all of the constitutional issues raised in the petition was reversible error, and the case was remanded for consideration of all issues raised by Samples in the petition. St. v. Samples, 2005 MT 210, 328 M 242, 119 P3d 1191 (2005).

Sexual and Violent Offender Registration Requirements Not Part of Criminal Sentencing — Registration Violation Separate Offense: White Bear was convicted of failing to register as a sexual or violent offender. On appeal, White Bear contended that offender registration violated due process, but the argument was based on an incorrect premise that registration was a condition of sentencing and punishment for the original offense. In fact, the registration requirements are not part of criminal sentencing for a sexual or violent offense, and violation of registration requirements is a separate offense. White Bear's conviction for failing to register as a sexual or violent offender was affirmed. St. v. White Bear, 2005 MT 7, 325 M 337, 106 P3d 516 (2005). See also St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003).

Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act Nonpunitive — Not Considered Ex Post Facto Legislation: Defendant was convicted of failing to update registration as a violent sexual offender. The District Court found that the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act, Title 46, ch. 23, part 5, was ex post facto because 46-23-504 subjected defendant to enhanced punishment based on a prior conviction. The state appealed. Applying Smith v. Doe, 538 US 84, 123 S Ct 1140 (2003), which dealt with an Alaskan registration act similar to the Montana Act, the Supreme Court noted that if both the declared purpose and the structure of a sexual violent offender registration law are nonpunitive, then the intent is to enact a civil regulatory scheme. The court then conducted an indepth analysis of the intent and effects of Montana's law, finding that the legislative intent was clearly nonpunitive, noting that codification of the law in the Montana code of criminal procedure did not in itself transform the law from a nonpunitive civil regulatory scheme into a criminal one. As to effects, the court applied the factors in Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 US 144 (1963), finding the regulatory scheme to be a reasonable effort on the part of the Legislature to tailor what information may and may not be disclosed, and held that the registration requirements were not excessive. As a nonpunitive act designed for public protection, the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act does not violate the ex post facto clauses of the state or federal constitution. The District Court was reversed, and the charges against defendant were reinstated. St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), followed in St. v. Murphy, 2003 MT 276, 317 M 500, 78 P3d 843 (2003). However, see St. v. Hinman, 2023 MT 116, 412 Mont. 434, 530 P.3d 1271, holding that amendments from 2007 and after are punitive and cannot be applied retroactively without violating Article II, section 31, of the Montana Constitution.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 33, Ch. 167, L. 2023, and sec. 1, Ch. 643, L. 2023, were replaced by sec. 7, Ch. 643, L. 2023.

The amendment to this section made by sec. 4, Ch. 205, L. 2023, was rendered void by sec. 8, Ch. 643, L. 2023.

The amendment to this section made by sec. 3, Ch. 465, L. 2023, was rendered void by sec. 9, Ch. 643, L. 2023.

In (10)(a)(xvii) the Code Commissioner substituted “(10)(a)(xvi)” for “(10)(a)(xv)” to reflect the insertion of new subsection (10)(a)(xvi) by sec. 9, Ch. 643, L. 2023.

2019 Amendment: Chapter 308 in (9)(a) near end inserted reference to 45-5-603(2)(c); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 7, 2019.

Applicability: Section 16, Ch. 308, L. 2019, provided: “[This act] applies to offenses committed on or after [the effective date of this act].” Effective May 7, 2019.

2017 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 277 in definition of sexual offense in (a) near middle substituted “45-5-503(1), (3), or (4)” for “45-5-503”. Amendment effective October 1, 2017.

Chapter 279 in definition of sexual offense in (a) inserted reference to 45-5-508. Amendment effective October 1, 2017.

Chapter 394 in definition of violent offense in (a) inserted reference to 45-5-215. Amendment effective May 19, 2017.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 277, L. 2017, provided: “[This act] applies to offenses committed on or after [the effective date of this act].” Effective October 1, 2017.

Section 8, Ch. 279, L. 2017, provided: “[This act] applies to crimes committed on or after [the effective date of this act].” Effective October 1, 2017.

2015 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 110 in definition of sexual offender evaluator substituted “psychosexual evaluations of sexual offenders and sexually violent predators” for “sexual offender and sexually violent predator evaluations”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2015.

Chapter 144 in definition of sexual offense in (a) substituted “45-5-504(3) (if the victim is less than 16 years of age and the offender is 4 or more years older than the victim)” for “45-5-504(1) (if the victim is under 18 years of age and the offender is 18 years of age or older)”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2015.

Chapter 182 in definition of sexual offense in (a) after “45-5-311” inserted language concerning a violation of 45-5-502 by a professional licensed under Title 37 in certain circumstances. Amendment effective April 2, 2015.

Chapter 285 in definition of sexual offense in (a) deleted references to 45-5-310 and 45-5-311 and inserted references to 45-5-704 and 45-5-705; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2015.

Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 182, L. 2015, provided: “[This act] applies to offenses committed on or after [the effective date of this act].” Effective April 2, 2015.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 374 in definition of sexual offense in (a) near middle inserted references to 45-5-310 and 45-5-311 and near end substituted reference to 45-5-603(2)(b) for reference to 45-5-603(2)(c). Amendment effective July 1, 2013.

Applicability: Section 19, Ch. 374, L. 2013, provided: “[This act] applies to offenses committed on or after [the effective date of this act].” Effective July 1, 2013.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 483 inserted definitions of municipality, registration agency, residence, and transient; in definition of sexual offense in (a) near beginning after “45-5-302” inserted “(if the victim is less than 18 years of age and the offender is not a parent of the victim)”, after “45-5-303” inserted “(if the victim is less than 18 years of age and the offender is not a parent of the victim)”, after “45-5-502(3)” inserted “(if the victim is less than 16 years of age and the offender is 3 or more years older than the victim)”, in parenthetical clause following “45-5-507” after second "victim" inserted "or if the victim is 12 years of age or younger and the offender is 18 years of age or older at the time of the offense", near end inserted references to 45-5-601(3) and 45-5-602(3), and after "45-5-603(1)(b)" inserted "or (2)(c)" and in (b) near beginning after "state" inserted "a tribal government" and near end after "after" inserted "an adjudication"; in definition of sexual or violent offender after "convicted of" inserted "or, in youth court, found to have committed or been adjudicated for"; in definition of sexually violent predator in (a) after "convicted of" inserted "or, in youth court, found to have committed or been adjudicated for" and inserted (b) including in the definition a person who has been convicted of a sexual offense against a victim 12 years of age or younger and the offender is 18 years of age or older; in definition of violent offense in (a) after "45-5-213" inserted "45-5-302 (if the victim is not a minor), 45-5-303 (if the victim is not a minor)" and in (b) after "state" inserted "a tribal government"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 31, Ch. 483, L. 2007, provided: "[Sections 2, 3, and 19 through 24] [amending 41-5-216, 41-5-1513, 46-23-502, 46-23-504, 46-23-505, 46-23-506, 46-23-508, and 46-23-509] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

2005 Amendment: Chapter 313 in definition of sexual offense in (b) at end after "(6)(a)" inserted "or for which the offender was required to register as a sex offender after conviction"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 146 in definition of violent offense in (a) at end inserted "or 45-9-132"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2002 Amendment: Chapter 22 in definition of sexual offense in (a) near beginning inserted "45-5-301 (if the victim is less than 18 years of age and the offender is not a parent of the victim), 45-5-302, 45-5-303" and near end inserted "45-5-603(1)(b)"; and in definition of violent offense deleted from the listed offenses "45-5-301 (if the victim is less than 18 years of age and the offender is not a parent of the victim), 45-5-302, 45-5-303" and "45-5-603(1)(b)". Amendment effective August 21, 2002.

Applicability: Section 9, Ch. 22, Sp. L. August 2002, provided: "[This act] applies to convictions on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective August 21, 2002.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 227 in definition of sexual offense in (a) after "45-5-503" inserted "45-5-504(1) (if the victim is under 18 years of age and the offender is 18 years of age or older)" and after "45-5-507" substituted "(if the victim is under 18 years of age and the offender is 3 or more years older than the victim)" for "(unless the act occurred between two consenting persons 16 years of age or older)"; in definition of violent offense in (a) inserted reference to 45-5-210(1)(b), (1)(c), or (1)(d); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 432 in definition of violent offense inserted "45-5-212, 45-5-213". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 inserted definitions of mental abnormality, personality disorder, predatory sexual offense, sexual offender evaluator, and sexually violent predator; in definition of sexual offense, in (a) after "violation of", inserted "or attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit a violation of"; in definition of violent offense, in (a) after "violation of", inserted "or attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit a violation of", after "45-5-202" inserted "45-5-206 (third or subsequent offense), 45-5-301 (when the victim is less than 18 years of age and the offender is not a parent of the victim)", and after "45-5-401" inserted "45-5-603(1)(b)"; and adjusted subsection references.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 407 in (2)(a) inserted reference to 45-5-504(2)(c) and after "45-5-505" inserted parenthetical referring to deviate sexual conduct with an animal; in (3), in two places, inserted "or violent"; and inserted definition of violent offense. The amendment in (2)(a) was rendered void pursuant to sec. 12, Ch. 550, L. 1995, a coordination section.

Chapter 546 in definition of Department substituted “department of corrections provided for in 2-15-2301” for “department of corrections and human services provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 23”. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 550 in (2)(a), after “45-5-503”, substituted “45-5-504(2)(c)” for “45-5-505”.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Coordination: Section 12, Ch. 550, L. 1995, provided: “If [this act] and House Bill No. 214 are both passed and approved, then the amendment to 46-23-502(3)(a) [now 46-23-502(2)(a)] in House Bill No. 214 is void.” House Bill No. 214 was approved as Ch. 407, L. 1995, on April 13, 1995. Although the amendment to 46-23-502(2)(a) in House Bill No. 214 is void, a similar amendment was made by Ch. 550.

1991 Amendment — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed “department of institutions” to “department of corrections and human services”, pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Case Notes

Oral Pronouncement of Sentence Controlled Over Written — Failure to Give Notice of Change of Address Not Sexual Offense: The defendant was convicted of failure to give notice of a change of address by a sexual offender. The District Court pronounced an oral sentence waiving fines, fees, surcharges, and the public defender fee; however, it provided a written order requiring the defendant to pay fees and fines totaling $980. The court also imposed a sexual offender tier level designation as part of the sentence. On appeal, the defendant argued that the oral pronouncement of the sentence controlled and that the crime of not giving notice of change of address did not warrant a sexual offender tier level designation. The Supreme Court agreed with the defendant, holding that the oral pronouncement controlled and that the charged offense is not a sexual offense that would allow designation of a sexual offender tier level. St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Getaway Driver Accountable for Robbery — Restitution Not Specified by District Court — Sentence Greater Than Under Failed Plea Agreement: The defendant was convicted of accountability for robbery after serving as the getaway driver. The defendant originally agreed with the state to a 20-year sentence with 15 years suspended. This agreement was withdrawn because the District Court did not agree to the terms. After trial, the District Court ordered restitution to be determined at a later date, sentenced the defendant to 30 years in prison with 10 suspended, and required the defendant to register as a violent offender. On appeal, the defendant argued that restitution must be specified by the District Court, that imposing a greater sentence after trial was improper, and that it was improper to require registration as a violent offender because he was convicted of accountability. The Supreme Court agreed with the defendant regarding restitution and remanded for a determination. However, the Supreme Court found that the District Court properly sentenced the defendant by giving specific reasons for the sentence imposed and that the defendant’s crime qualified as a violent offense under the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act. St. v. Hanna, 2014 MT 346, 377 Mont. 418, 341 P.3d 629.

Jury Instruction on Previous Conviction of “Sexual Offense” Under Washington Law Proper — No Violation of Due Process — District Court Affirmed: The defendant had previously been convicted of “second degree assault with sexual motivation” in Washington. Sometime after moving to Montana, he failed to inform local officials of his change of address. The defendant was located and was charged with failure to provide notice of address change under Montana’s Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act (SVORA), a felony. At trial, the District Court instructed the jury that the defendant’s conviction under Washington law constituted a sexual offense that triggered the notification provisions of SVORA. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the jury instruction violated his due process rights by usurping the jury’s role to determine whether his conviction in Washington constituted an offense under SVORA, thereby lowering the state’s burden of proof. In affirming the District Court, the Supreme Court agreed that the court had properly instructed the jury on the law of the case and had not violated the defendant’s due process rights. St. v. DaSilva, 2011 MT 183, 361 Mont. 288, 258 P.3d 419.

Duty to Register Under Montana Sexual Offender Law Independent of Registration Conditions of Federal Supervision Order: A juvenile was adjudged delinquent in federal court for knowingly engaging in sexual acts with a person under 12 years old and was required to register under the federal sexual offender registration act. The term of the juvenile’s supervision under the federal program expired in 2008. The United States Supreme Court certified to the Montana Supreme Court the question of whether the juvenile’s duty to remain registered as a sexual offender under Montana law is an independent requirement that is unaffected by the validity or invalidity of federal supervision conditions. The Montana Supreme Court held that the federal offense was similar to Montana's sexual offense law and that under the Montana sexual offender registration law the juvenile has a continuing duty to register that is independent of the federal supervision order. United States v. Juvenile Male, 2011 MT 104, 360 Mont. 317, 255 P.3d 110.

Court Designation of Sexual Offender Level Only for Sexual Offenses as Defined: Holt pleaded guilty to a charge of burglary based upon an unlawful entry into a private residence for the purposes of touching an underage female and the court, based upon a psychosexual evaluation, designated Holt a level 3 sexual offender. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred when it designated Holt a level 3 sexual offender because burglary is not one of the offenses defined as a sexual offense by 46-23-502 for the purposes of 46-18-201. St. v. Holt, 2011 MT 42, 359 Mont. 308, 249 P.3d 470, followed in St. v. Leyva, 2012 MT 124, 365 Mont. 204, 280 P.3d 252.

Erroneous Reference to Offense in Charging Document — No Grounds for Reversal Absent Surprise or Prejudice: As a condition of sentencing, Bahr was required to maintain registration as a violent offender. Bahr was subsequently charged with failure to provide notice of a change of address, and the charge was later amended to failing to provide notice of a change of residence. At trial, Bahr asserted that the charge should be dismissed because the initial charging document cited an offense of failure to provide notice of a change of address that was not a crime. The District Court concluded that the charging document properly charged an offense under 46-23-507 and dismissed Bahr's argument. On appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The original information and the supporting affidavit clearly set out that Bahr was required to register as a violent offender, that the last registration was completed in Glacier County in 2002, and that Bahr had acknowledged the requirement to provide notice of any change but had failed to provide notice after moving from Glacier County and residing in Cascade County for over a month without updating the registration information. This was enough as a matter of law to apprise Bahr of the charges and to prevent any surprise. Even if there were errors in wording in the charging document, there was no ground for reversal unless Bahr demonstrated prejudice. Additionally, amendment of the information from "change of address" to "change of residence" was not substantive. Therefore, absent surprise or prejudice, the District Court properly declined to dismiss the charge. St. v. Bahr, 2009 MT 378, 353 M 294, 224 P3d 610 (2009), followed in St. v. E.M.R., 2013 MT 3, 368 Mont. 179, 292 P.3d 451.

Criminal Endangerment Not Requiring Registration as Violent Offender: Upon conviction for felony criminal endangerment, Perkins was required to register as a violent offender. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that criminal endangerment is not an offense that requires registration as a violent offender. The court ordered that the registration condition be stricken from Perkins' sentence. St. v. Perkins, 2009 MT 150, 350 M 387, 208 P3d 386 (2009).

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to 41-5-1513, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under 46-18-201. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended this section to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that 41-5-1513 suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007).

distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Retroactivity of Requirement That Out-of-State Sexual Offenders Convicted in State That Requires Registration Also Register in Montana: The 2005 Legislature amended this section to provide that, as a matter of public safety, a sexual offender convicted in another jurisdiction that requires registration of sexual offenders must register in Montana upon taking up residence in this state, regardless of the specific sexual crime committed in the other state. However, the 2005 amendments were not applied retroactively from their October 1, 2005, effective date. Examining the legislative history, the Supreme Court noted that the amendments were enacted for administrative efficiency rather than as a punitive measure. If the amendments were applied only to offenses committed after the effective date, the result would be administrative chaos rather than efficiency. Therefore, the Legislature intended the 2005 amendments to apply retroactively, and Hamilton, who was convicted of a sexual crime in Washington in 1996 and was required to register there, was also required to register in Montana after moving here in 2000. St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 167, 338 M 142, 164 P3d 884 (2007), following St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003).

Washington Youth Sexual Offender Required to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender if Residing in Montana: At age 15, Villanueva was adjudicated guilty of first degree rape in Washington state and was later required to register for life in that state as a sexual offender. Villanueva subsequently moved to Montana where he resided for 6 weeks. After being arrested for a domestic disturbance, it was discovered that Villanueva had not registered as a sexual or violent offender in Montana, and he was charged with failure to register. Villanueva contended that Montana law did not apply to his Washington registration requirement because he did not meet the definition of sexual or violent offender under this section and because a 1989 Attorney General's opinion held that juveniles adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act whose cases have not been transferred to District Court are not required to register. Villanueva moved to dismiss the charge, but the District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the Washington definition of sexual offender may not have been identical to the Montana definition, Villanueva was nevertheless a sexual offender under Washington law and was therefore required to register in Montana under 46-23-504. Further, Villanueva could not rely on the Attorney General's opinion because he was not adjudicated under the Montana Youth Court Act. The Supreme Court noted that the Washington sexual offender registration law also required Villanueva to register in another state if he changed state residency, so under both Washington and Montana law, Villanueva was required to register as a sexual offender. Villanueva's motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Attorney General's Opinions

Registration of Out-of-State Sexual and Violent Offenders: A sexual or violent offender who is convicted of a violation of any law of another state or the federal government that is reasonably equivalent to a violation of subsection (6) or (9) of this section and who is sentenced on or after July 1, 1989, must register with the local law enforcement agency within 10 days of entering a Montana county for the purpose of taking up permanent or temporary residence. The registration requirement applies whether or not the state in which the offender was convicted has a registration program. 47 A.G. Op. 15 (1998).

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 in (1), after "writing", inserted "not less than 10 days" and after "under" deleted "46-18-254, 46-18-255, and"; in (2), at beginning of introductory clause, inserted "Prior to the offender's release from custody" and after "obtain" substituted "and give to the department of justice and to the sheriff of the county in which the offender intends to reside or, if the offender intends to reside in a municipality, to the chief of police of the municipality" for "the address at which the person expects to reside upon the person's release and report"; in (2)(a), after "address", substituted "at which the offender intends to reside upon release from the department's custody" for "to the department of corrections. The department shall inform the appropriate law enforcement agency having local jurisdiction where the person expects to reside"; inserted (2)(b) regarding the offender's fingerprints and photo; inserted (2)(c) regarding the registration form; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: “The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995.”

1995 Amendments: Chapter 407 near beginning, after “sexual”, inserted “or violent”; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 546 in first sentence, after “department of corrections”, deleted “and human services or the department of family services” and in second sentence substituted “department of corrections” for “department of corrections and human services”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed “department of institutions” to “department of corrections and human services”, pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Case Notes

Release From Confinement, Not Supervision, Trigger for Registration as Sexual or Violent Offender: Azure asserted that because he was still under direct supervision of the Department of Corrections under the intensive supervision program following his release from prison, he was not required to register as a sexual or violent offender. The Supreme Court disagreed. The trigger for registration is the release from confinement, not release from confinement and supervision. Thus, Azure was required to register within 10 days of release from confinement, notwithstanding continued Department supervision during Azure’s conditional release. St. v. Azure, 2008 MT 211, 344 M 188, 186 P3d 1269 (2008), overruling Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319 M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004), to the extent that Wagner provided that registration is required upon release from confinement and supervision.

Public Warning of Release of Violent Offender Futile: The plaintiffs sued the state in tort on the basis that the state should have issued a public warning announcing the release of a violent offender who subsequently murdered their child. The Supreme Court ruled that the Legislature had considered the issue of warning the public in its last regular session, had recognized the futility of a warning requirement, and had not made issuing warnings of the release of violent offenders a statutory obligation of the state. VanLuchene v. St., 244 M 397, 797 P2d 932, 47 St. Rep. 1609 (1990).

2023 Amendment: See 2023 Session Law for amendment made by sec. 2, Ch. 643, L. 2023. Amendment effective October 1, 2023.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 110 inserted (3)(h) concerning offender e-mail addresses and screen names; in (4)(a) in second sentence near middle substituted “shall require” for “may require”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2015.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 101 in (3) at end of second sentence inserted “and obtain a DNA sample from the offender” and inserted fourth sentence concerning DNA sample analysis and DNA identification index; in (6)(c) at end after “photograph of the offender” inserted language concerning DNA sample analysis and DNA identification index; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2013.

2007 Amendments — Composite Section — Coordination: Section 4, Ch. 254, L. 2007, a coordination section, in (3) inserted fourth sentence requiring yearly photographs for level 2 or 3 offenders. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Chapter 483 in (1) at beginning of introductory clause inserted exception clause; in (1)(c) near beginning after “within” substituted “3 business days” for “10 days” and near middle after “temporary” substituted “residence” for “domicile”; inserted (1)(d) requiring an offender who is a transient to register within 3 business days of entering a county of this state; in (2) near beginning of first sentence after “(1)(c)” inserted “or (1)(d)” and after “with the” substituted “appropriate registration agency” for “chief of police of the municipality or the sheriff of the county if the offender resides in an area other than a municipality”; at beginning of second sentence substituted “If an offender registers with a police department, the department” for “Whichever law enforcement official the offender registers with” and after “notify the” substituted “sheriff’s office of the county in which the municipality is located” for “other official”, and near end of third sentence after “appropriate” substituted “registration” for “law enforcement”; in (3) near middle of first sentence after “required by” inserted “subsections (3)(a) through (3)(g) and any other information required by”, at beginning of second sentence and near beginning of third sentence substituted “registration agency” for “chief of police or sheriff”, and inserted fifth sentence and (3)(a) through (3)(g) outlining information required to be collected from the offender at the time of registration; inserted (4) requiring registration in each county or municipality if an offender regularly resides in more than one county or municipality at the time of registration; inserted (5) requiring monthly reporting by a transient; inserted (6)(a)(ii) requiring the mailing of a registration form each 180 days to a level 2 offender; in (6)(a)(iii) after “level 1” deleted “or level 2”; inserted (6)(b) regarding mailing of forms to transients; in (6)(c) in first sentence after “offender’s” deleted “current address and”, at end of second sentence substituted “registration agency where the offender last registered or, if the offender was initially registered pursuant to subsection (1)(b), to the registration agency in the county or municipality in which the offender is located” for “department”, and inserted third sentence requiring the offender to return the form to the appropriate registration agency in person and requiring the registration agency to take a photograph of the offender at the time that the sexual offender returns the registration verification form; inserted (7) requiring the registration agency to provide a copy of the form and the photograph to the department of justice within 3 days; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 1, Ch. 254, L. 2007, were rendered void by sec. 4, Ch. 254, L. 2007, a coordination section.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 31, Ch. 483, L. 2007, provided: “[Sections 2, 3, and 19 through 24] [amending 41-5-216, 41-5-1513, 46-23-502, 46-23-504, 46-23-505, 46-23-506, 46-23-508, and 46-23-509] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995.”

2005 Amendment: Chapter 313 in (2) near beginning of first sentence after “(1)(a)” inserted “or (1)(c)” and after “with the” deleted “probation office having supervision over the offender. Registration under subsection (1)(c) must be with the”, in second sentence at beginning after “Whichever” substituted “law enforcement official” for “person”, after “registers with” deleted “under subsection (1)(c)”, and after “other” substituted “official” for “person”, and inserted third sentence requiring a supervising probation officer to verify the offender’s registration status with the appropriate law enforcement agency; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2002 Amendment: Chapter 22 in (1)(c) at end substituted “or for an aggregate period exceeding 30 days in a calendar year” for “if the offender was sentenced in another state”. Amendment effective August 21, 2002.

Applicability: Section 9, Ch. 22, Sp. L. August 2002, provided: “[This act] applies to convictions on or after [the effective date of this act].” Effective August 21, 2002.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 in (1), near beginning after “offender”, substituted (1)(a) regarding registration upon conclusion of the sentencing hearing and (1)(b) regarding registration 10 days prior to release for “shall, within 14 days of conviction or release from prison or”; in (1)(c), at beginning, inserted “shall register”, after “within” substituted “10 days” for “14 days”, after “domicile for” substituted “10 days” for “14 days”, and at end inserted “if the offender was sentenced in another state”; in (2), at beginning of first sentence, substituted “Registration under subsection (1)(a) must be with the probation office having supervision over the offender. Registration under subsection (1)(c) must be” for “register, as required under 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part” and inserted third sentence requiring notice to the other person; in (3), in four places, substituted reference to offender for reference to person, at end of first sentence, after “department”, inserted “of justice”, and in third sentence, after “photographs to the”, deleted “department and the” and after “justice” deleted “and to the sheriff of the county where the person resides, if registration is with the chief of police”; inserted (4) regarding the registration verification form; in (5), at beginning of first sentence after “The”, substituted “offender” for “person registered under this section” and inserted third and fourth sentences regarding fees to cover registration costs; in (6), after “within”, substituted “10 days” for “14 days”; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: “The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995.”

1995 Amendment: Chapter 407 in (1), near beginning after “sexual”, inserted “or violent” and substituted “conviction or release from prison or within 14 days of entering a county of this state for the purpose of residing or setting up a temporary domicile for 14 days or more” for “coming into a county in which he resides or is temporarily domiciled”; inserted (2) relating to signing an information statement, to fingerprints, to photos, and to sending the statement, fingerprints, and photos to certain agencies; inserted (3) relating to the person’s payment of registration costs; inserted (4) requiring notice to the Sheriff after entry of judgment; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Duty to Register After Expiration of Statutory Limit — Petition Process Unconstitutional: The defendant was charged with failure to register as a violent offender that stemmed from a conviction 15 years earlier. The defendant entered an Alford plea to the failure to register charge and was sentenced to a 5-year commitment with the Department of Corrections. The defendant then appealed his conviction and challenged the constitutionality of 46-23-506, which required offenders to petition to be relieved of the duty to register even when the statutory deadline requiring registration had expired. The Supreme Court exercised plain error review and held that the statutory petition process was arbitrary and capricious and violated due process. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and vacated the defendant’s conviction. St. v. Sedler, 2020 MT 248, 401 Mont. 437, 473 P.3d 406.

Motion to Amend Information on Day of Trial — Abuse of Discretion: The defendant was charged with failure to provide notice of a change in residence as an offender. On the morning of trial, the state moved to amend the information to revise the date of the offense over the defendant’s objection. The District Court allowed the information to be amended and the defendant was convicted. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court had abused its discretion because the amendment altered the proof requirements of his defense in that one element of the crime was the number of days that had elapsed before reporting his new residence. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed and remanded. St. v. Hardground, 2019 MT 14, 394 Mont. 104, 433 P.3d 711.

Getaway Driver Accountable for Robbery — Restitution Not Specified by District Court — Sentence Greater Than Under Failed Plea Agreement: The defendant was convicted of accountability for robbery after serving as the getaway driver. The defendant originally agreed with the state to a 20-year sentence with 15 years suspended. This agreement was withdrawn because the District Court did not agree to the terms. After trial, the District Court ordered restitution to be determined at a later date, sentenced the defendant to 30 years in prison with 10 suspended, and required the defendant to register as a violent offender. On appeal, the defendant argued that restitution must be specified by the District Court, that imposing a greater sentence after trial was improper, and that it was improper to require registration as a violent offender because he was convicted of accountability. The Supreme Court agreed with the defendant regarding restitution and remanded for a determination. However, the Supreme Court found that the District Court properly sentenced the defendant by giving specific reasons for the sentence imposed and that the defendant’s crime qualified as a violent offense under the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act. St. v. Hanna, 2014 MT 346, 377 Mont. 418, 341 P.3d 629.

Violent Offender Registration and Disclosure Requirements Not Violative of Privacy or Right of Convicted to Restoration of Rights: The defendant was convicted of arson and received a 4-year suspended sentence. In addition, the sentencing court required him to register as a violent offender for at least 10 years. The defendant appealed the registration requirement. Similar to the defendant in Mount, he argued that the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act, as applied to a violent offender, violated his right to privacy. The Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that the state has a compelling state interest to protect the public and that the Act is narrowly tailored to achieve that interest. St. v. Brooks, 2012 MT 263, 367 Mont. 59, 289 P.3d 105, following St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 Mont. 481, 78 P.3d 829.

Defendant’s Agreement in Plea Bargain That Included Possibility of Sex Offender Registration — Authority of Sentencing Court to Include Registration as Sentencing Condition: Grana was convicted of multiple burglaries, which would not otherwise require registration as a sexual offender. However, Grana acknowledged that he entered the homes to commit “sexually offensive acts against the occupants”, and Grana’s original plea agreement provided that the District Court could require sex offender registration, subject to Grana’s right to argue that registration was not appropriate. Grana agreed to and obtained the full benefit of the plea bargain, which was sufficient to bring the case within the authority of 46-23-512 and to authorize the District Court to require registration as a sentencing condition as a matter of law. St. v. Grana, 2009 MT 250, 351 M 499, 213 P3d 783 (2009). See also In re T.M.L., 2012 MT 9, 363 Mont. 304, 268 P.3d 1255.

Violent Offender Registration Not Required for Criminal Endangerment: Rowe was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and misdemeanor negligent endangerment after assaulting a 2-year-old child whom Rowe was babysitting. As a sentencing condition, the District Court required Rowe to register as a violent offender. Rowe appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Criminal endangerment is not a statutorily listed violent offense for which registration is required. St. v. Rowe, 2009 MT 225, 351 M 334, 217 P3d 471 (2009). See also St. v. Old Bull, 2017 MT 247, 389 Mont. 56, 403 P.3d 670.

Criminal Endangerment Not Requiring Registration as Violent Offender: Upon conviction for felony criminal endangerment, Perkins was required to register as a violent offender. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that criminal endangerment is not an offense that requires registration as a violent offender. The court ordered that the registration condition be stricken from Perkins’ sentence. St. v. Perkins, 2009 MT 150, 350 M 387, 208 P3d 386 (2009).

Release From Confinement, Not Supervision, Trigger for Registration as Sexual or Violent Offender: Azure asserted that because he was still under direct supervision of the Department of Corrections under the intensive supervision program following his release from prison, he was not required to register as a sexual or violent offender. The Supreme Court disagreed. The trigger for registration is the release from confinement, not release from confinement and supervision. Thus, Azure was required to register within 10 days of release from confinement, notwithstanding continued Department supervision during Azure’s conditional release. St. v. Azure, 2008 MT 211, 344 M 188, 186 P3d 1269 (2008), overruling Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319 M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004), to the extent that Wagner provided that registration is required upon release from confinement and supervision.

Washington Youth Sexual Offender Required to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender if Residing in Montana: At age 15, Villanueva was adjudicated guilty of first degree rape in Washington state and was later required to register for life in that state as a sexual offender. Villanueva subsequently moved to Montana where he resided for 6 weeks. After being arrested for a domestic disturbance, it was discovered that Villanueva had not registered as a sexual or violent offender in Montana, and he was charged with failure to register. Villanueva contended that Montana law did not apply to his Washington registration requirement because he did not meet the definition of sexual or violent offender under 46-23-502 and because a 1989 Attorney General’s opinion held that juveniles adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act whose cases have not been transferred to District Court are not required to register. Villanueva moved to dismiss the charge, but the District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the Washington definition of sexual offender may not have been identical to the Montana definition, Villanueva was nevertheless a sexual offender under Washington law and was therefore required to register in Montana under this section. Further, Villanueva could not rely on the Attorney General’s opinion because he was not adjudicated under the Montana Youth Court Act. The Supreme Court noted that the Washington sexual offender registration law also required Villanueva to register in another state if he changed state residency, so under both Washington and Montana law, Villanueva was required to register as a sexual offender. Villanueva’s motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Sexual and Violent Offender Registration Requirements Not Part of Criminal Sentencing — Registration Violation Separate Offense: White Bear was convicted of failing to register as a sexual or violent offender. On appeal, White Bear contended that offender registration violated due process, but the argument was based on an incorrect premise that registration was a condition of sentencing and punishment for the original offense. In fact, the registration requirements are not part of criminal sentencing for a sexual or violent offense, and violation of registration requirements is a separate offense. White Bear’s conviction for failing to register as a sexual or violent offender was affirmed. St. v. White Bear, 2005 MT 7, 325 M 337, 106 P3d 516 (2005). See also St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003).

Instructions for Self-Destructive Activity Given From Afar — Elements of Aggravated Assault Satisfied Given Foreseeability of Injury: Posing as a doctor, Sherer made numerous telephone calls from Florida to Montana women, asking the women to do destructive things to their bodies under the guise of performing self-tests to diagnose possible infection. Three women harmed themselves at Sherer's suggestion, for which Sherer was convicted of two counts of criminal endangerment and one count of aggravated assault and ordered to register as a violent offender. Sherer appealed the aggravated assault charge, arguing that encouraging "someone to injure themselves does not constitute aggravated assault" and that the causation element was too remote to form the basis of an aggravated assault charge. The Supreme Court disagreed. Sherer's instructions to the victims were intended to produce the precise injuries suffered, and by admitting to the facts in the information, Sherer could not credibly claim that he did not intend the injuries because the injuries flowed directly from Sherer's instructions. Statutes defining aggravated assault, cause, act, and conduct gave fair warning that the nature of Sherer's conduct constituted the offense of aggravated assault if that conduct resulted in the intended injuries. The definition of aggravated assault does not require a defined parameter of proximity between defendant and victim or require that a defendant personally direct force toward the victim, but specifically contemplates that any form of communication may itself be sufficient conduct. Sherer was successful in causing the intended injury, and his attempts to blame the victim for falling for the deceptive, illegal activity were meritless. The aggravated assault conviction was affirmed. St. v. Sherer, 2002 MT 337, 313 M 299, 60 P3d 1010 (2002).

Violent Offender Registration Not Violative of Due Process: After being convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide, Miller contended that the District Court's order requiring him to register as a violent offender infringed his right to due process because the court made no specific findings regarding his violent offender status and failed to hold a hearing to allow the introduction of contradictory evidence regarding his status. However, violent offender status is determined purely by this section. The registration statute does not vest a District Court with the discretion to designate defendants as violent offenders, does not prescribe a notice and hearing procedure for determining violent offender status, and does not require a District Court to issue findings based on evidence regarding a defendant's violent offender status. Rather, a defendant's designation as a violent offender is triggered merely by conviction of a violent offense. The process due to a defendant for designation as a violent offender is reasonable notice and an opportunity to be heard during sentencing. St. v. Miller, 1998 MT 177, 290 M 97, 966 P2d 721, 55 St. Rep. 719 (1998), following St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990).

Violent Offender Registration Requirement Not Retroactive: Prior to July 1993, Whitmer was sentenced for felony assault (now assault with a weapon). Upon his release in January 1996, Whitmer was notified of his obligation to register as a violent offender. Whitmer did not register and was charged with and convicted of failure to register as a violent offender. On appeal, he claimed that the 1995 amendments to this section, which added individuals convicted of a violent offense to the list of those required to register, did not apply retroactively. Although the original bill adding the amendments did contain a retroactive applicability clause, the clause was removed during the legislative process when the issue arose that applying the law retroactively might violate the ban on ex post facto legislation. The Legislature did not express its intent to apply the amendments retroactively in the final version of the bill. Therefore, Whitmer had no obligation to register after his release from prison because the amendments did not apply to crimes committed before October 1, 1995. Whitmer's conviction on failure to register was reversed. St. v. Whitmer, 285 M 100, 946 P2d 137, 54 St. Rep. 1063 (1997).

Attorney General's Opinions

Registration of Out-of-State Sexual and Violent Offenders: A sexual or violent offender who is convicted of a violation of any law of another state or the federal government that is reasonably equivalent to a violation of 46-23-502(6) or (9) and who is sentenced on or after July 1, 1989, must register with the local law enforcement agency within 10 days of entering a Montana county for the purpose of taking up permanent or temporary residence. The registration requirement applies whether or not the state in which the offender was convicted has a registration program. 47 A.G. Op. 15 (1998).

46-23-505. Notice of change of name or residence or student, employment, or transient status — duty to inform — forwarding of information.

Compiler's Comments

2023 Amendment: See 2023 Session Law for amendment made by sec. 3, Ch. 643, L. 2023. Amendment effective October 1, 2023.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 283 inserted (4) and (5) concerning offenders who are physically absent from their county of residence for more than 10 days. Amendment effective April 24, 2013.

2007 Amendments — Composite Section — Coordination: Section 5, Ch. 254, L. 2007, in (1) in first sentence near middle after “46-23-504(1)(b)” substituted “to the registration agency for the county or municipality” for “to the department and to the chief of police of the municipality or sheriff of the county” and inserted second sentence requiring offenders to have a new photograph each year. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Chapter 483 in (1) near beginning after “change of” substituted “name or residence or a change in student, employment, or transient status” for “address”, after “within” substituted “3 business days” for “10 days”, after “change” substituted “appear in person and give notification of the change” for “give written notification of the new address”, before “agency” inserted “registration”, and after “46-23-504(1)(b), to the” substituted “registration agency for the county or municipality” for “department and to the chief of police of the municipality or sheriff of the county” and deleted former second sentence that read: “The agency or department shall, within 3 days after receipt of the new address, forward it to the department of justice, which shall forward a copy of the new address and photograph to the sheriff having jurisdiction over the new address and to the chief of police of the municipality of the new address if the new address is in a municipality”; inserted (2) concerning registration by a transient; inserted (3) regarding forwarding of the information by the registration agency and the department of justice; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 2, Ch. 254, L. 2007, were rendered void by sec. 5, Ch. 254, L. 2007, a coordination section.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 31, Ch. 483, L. 2007, provided: “[Sections 2, 3, and 19 through 24] [amending 41-5-216, 41-5-1513, 46-23-502, 46-23-504, 46-23-505, 46-23-506, 46-23-508, and 46-23-509] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995.”

2005 Amendment: Chapter 313 in first sentence near beginning after “part” substituted “has a change of address” for “changes residence” and at end after “registered” inserted “or, if the offender was initially registered under 46-23-504(1)(b), to the department and to the chief of police of the municipality or sheriff of the county from which the offender is moving” and in second sentence at beginning after “agency” inserted “or department” and near end in three places after “new” substituted “address” for “place of residence”. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 in first sentence, in three places, substituted “offender” for “person”, after “under” deleted “46-18-254, 46-18-255, and”, after “10 days” inserted “of the change”, and before “agency” deleted “law enforcement” and in second sentence, before “agency” deleted “law enforcement”, after “receipt of the” substituted “new address” for “information”, after “forward it to the” deleted “department, the”, after “justice” deleted “and the local law enforcement agency having jurisdiction over the new place of residence and”, after “copy of the” substituted “new address and photograph to the sheriff” for “statement, fingerprints, and photographs of the person to the local law enforcement agency”, and at end inserted “and to the chief of police of the municipality of the new place of residence if the new place of residence is in a municipality”; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: “The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995.”

1995 Amendment: Chapter 407 in second sentence inserted reference to the Department of Justice and at end inserted “and shall forward a copy of the statement, fingerprints, and photographs of the person to the local law enforcement agency having jurisdiction over the new place of residence”; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Condition of Sentence for Failure to Register — Restriction on Unsupervised Contact With Children Reasonably Related to Sentencing Objectives: The defendant pleaded guilty to failure to register as a sexual offender and received a 2-year suspended sentence but challenged the condition of his sentence that prohibited him from being in a place where children other than his own were present unless he was supervised by a trained chaperone. Given that the underlying crime for which he had to register was the rape of a minor, the District Court concluded, and the Supreme Court affirmed, that there was a sufficient nexus between the crime and the condition and that the condition was necessary to protect society. St. v. Melton, 2012 MT 84, 364 Mont. 482, 276 P.3d 900.

Sexual Offender's Failure to Provide Notification of Change of Address — Violation of Sexual Offender Registration Requirements: A sexual offender's failure to provide notification until 17 days after changing his residence violated the provisions of 46-23-505 that require a registered sexual offender to give notice of a change in address. St. v. Pearrow, 2011 MT 18, 359 Mont. 177, 248 P.3d 799.

Erroneous Reference to Offense in Charging Document — No Grounds for Reversal Absent Surprise or Prejudice: As a condition of sentencing, Bahr was required to maintain registration as a violent offender. Bahr was subsequently charged with failure to provide notice of a change of address, and the charge was later amended to failing to provide notice of a change of residence. At trial, Bahr asserted that the charge should be dismissed because the initial charging document cited an offense of failure to provide notice of a change of address that was not a crime. The District Court concluded that the charging document properly charged an offense under 46-23-507 and dismissed Bahr's argument. On appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The original information and the supporting affidavit clearly set out that Bahr was required to register as a violent offender, that the last registration was completed in Glacier County in 2002, and that Bahr had acknowledged the requirement to provide notice of any change but had failed to provide notice after moving from Glacier County and residing in Cascade County for over a month without updating the registration information. This was enough as a matter of law to apprise Bahr of the charges and to prevent any surprise. Even if there were errors in wording in the charging document, there was no ground for reversal unless Bahr demonstrated prejudice. Additionally, amendment of the information from "change of address" to "change of residence" was not substantive. Therefore, absent surprise or prejudice, the District Court properly declined to dismiss the charge. St. v. Bahr, 2009 MT 378, 353 M 294, 224 P3d 610 (2009), followed in St. v. E.M.R., 2013 MT 3, 368 Mont. 179, 292 P.3d 451.

Offender Registration Statute Not Void for Vagueness: This section uses clear language that gives fair notice to offenders that they are required to update their registration when they change their residence. Thus, the statute is not void for vagueness because it states with sufficient definiteness what offenders must do to maintain registration. St. v. Samples, 2008 MT 416, 347 M 292, 198 P3d 803 (2008).

Violation Upon Registrant's Failure to Notify Upon Move From Homeless Shelter to Streets: Samples was registered as a sexual offender while residing at a Billings homeless shelter. Samples moved out of the shelter but failed to notify authorities. Samples contended that he was not required to provide notice of a change of address because he moved from the shelter to the streets of the city and had no actual address. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 46-23-505, a registrant is required to provide notification of a change of residence, which Samples failed to do upon moving from the shelter. Because Samples failed to keep his registration current, he was subject to the penalty in 46-23-507. St. v. Samples, 2008 MT 416, 347 M 292, 198 P3d 803 (2008).

Release From Confinement, Not Supervision, Trigger for Registration as Sexual or Violent Offender: Azure asserted that because he was still under direct supervision of the Department of Corrections under the intensive supervision program following his release from prison, he was not required to register as a sexual or violent offender. The Supreme Court disagreed. The trigger for registration is the release from confinement, not release from confinement and supervision. Thus, Azure was required to register within 10 days of release from confinement, notwithstanding continued Department supervision during Azure's conditional release. St. v. Azure, 2008 MT 211, 344 M 188, 186 P3d 1269 (2008), overruling Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319 M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004), to the extent that Wagner provided that registration is required upon release from confinement and supervision.

Sexual Offender Registration Statute Unconstitutionally Vague Regarding Whether Residential or Mailing Address of Offender Required: Knudson was charged in 2005 with failure to reregister as a sexual offender after changing residences in Chouteau County. Knudson contended that the registration statute was unconstitutionally vague because it was unclear whether an offender was required to provide a residential address or a mailing address. Knudson asserted that the charge should be dismissed because the mailing address that he used when originally registering in 2002 did not change. The District Court denied the dismissal motion, but on appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The void for vagueness doctrine requires that a penal statute define the criminal offense with sufficient definiteness that an ordinary person can understand what conduct is prohibited and in a manner that does not encourage arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement. It was unclear from the face of this section whether an offender should provide a residential or mailing address when registering. The ambiguity in the use of the word “address” failed to provide Knudson with actual notice that a mailing address was insufficient, and the state’s action in charging Knudson for failing to reregister was arbitrary and discriminatory because if Knudson violated the statute by providing a mailing address instead of a residential address, the state should have notified Knudson of the violation when he first registered in 2002. The case was remanded for dismissal of the charge. (Note that the 2007 Legislature substituted “name or residence or a change in student, employment, or transient status” for “address” and applied the amendment retroactively to sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the Department of Corrections on or after July 1, 1989, and to violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the Department of Corrections on or after October 1, 1995.) St. v. Knudson, 2007 MT 324, 340 M 167, 174 P3d 469 (2007).

Conditioning Suspension of Part of Sentence for Failure to Register as Sex Offender on No Contact With Persons Under 18 and No Possession of Pornographic Material: Malloy, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty to failing to report his change of address. He appealed conditions on his suspended sentence that prohibited contact with persons under 18 years of age and access to or possession of pornographic or other material tending to arouse deviant thoughts or fantasies, claiming that the conditions were not reasonably related to the offense, as required by case law interpretation of the 46-18-201 provision allowing “reasonable restrictions or conditions considered necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society”. The Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act was adopted to protect the public from the recidivism of sex offenders, prevent victimization of vulnerable children, and assist law enforcement in keeping track of sex offenders. Malloy had two prior sex offense convictions and failed to complete two different sex offender programs. He had a history of inability to conform his conduct to the demands of the state’s sex offender laws and exhibited behavior placing society in danger because of his recidivism. The conditions were reasonably related to the goal of protecting society, including children. St. v. Malloy, 2004 MT 377, 325 M 86, 103 P3d 1064 (2004). See also St. v. Leyva, 2012 MT 124, 365 Mont. 204, 280 P.3d 252.

Suspension of Part of Sentence for Failure to Register as Sex Offender — Conditions in Written but Not Oral Judgment That Full Employment Be Maintained and Offender Not Have Contact With Victims: Malloy, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty to failing to report his change of address. The written judgment, but not the oral pronouncement of sentence, required him to maintain full-time employment and to not have contact with the victims of his offense. The court could not say that the conditions would not substantively increase his loss of liberty or sacrifice of property, and accordingly, the court ordered those conditions to be vacated. St. v. Malloy, 2004 MT 377, 325 M 86, 103 P3d 1064 (2004). See also St. v. Mehan, 2019 MT 100, 395 Mont. 383, 440 P.3d 25.

46-23-506. Duty of registration — duration, frequency, reduction, and relief.

Compiler’s Comments

2023 Amendment: See 2023 Session Law for amendment made by sec. 4, Ch. 643, L. 2023. Amendment effective October 1, 2023.

2021 Amendment: Chapter 227 in (2)(a) near middle substituted “and after registering for 10 years, is automatically relieved of the duty to register unless convicted as provided in subsection (2)(b)” for “but the offender is not relieved of the duty to register until a petition is granted under subsection (3)(a)”; in (2)(b) near middle after “of a felony” inserted “the offender shall register”; inserted (2)(c) regarding removal of the offender from the registry; deleted former (3)(a) that read: “(a) An offender required to register for 10 years under subsection (2)(a) may, after the 10 years have passed, petition the sentencing court or the district court for the judicial district in which the offender resides for an order relieving the offender of the duty to register. The petition must be served on the county attorney in the county where the petition is filed. The petition must be granted if the defendant has not been convicted under subsection (2)(b)”; in (3) near beginning after “10 years of registration for a” inserted “violent offender registered as provided in subsection (2)(b) or a”; in (5)(c) after “a second or subsequent sexual” inserted “or violent”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2021.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 483 in (3)(b) near middle of first sentence after “registration” inserted “for a level 1 sexual offender and at any time after 25 years of registration for a level

2 sexual offender" and after "an offender" deleted "required to register for life". Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 31, Ch. 483, L. 2007, provided: "[Sections 2, 3, and 19 through 24] [amending 41-5-216, 41-5-1513, 46-23-502, 46-23-504, 46-23-505, 46-23-506, 46-23-508, and 46-23-509] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

2005 Amendment: Chapter 313 in (2)(a) at end after "hearing" inserted "but the offender is not relieved of the duty to register until a petition is granted under subsection (3)(a)"; in (2)(b) at end after "(3)" inserted "(b)"; inserted (3)(a) allowing a registered offender to petition for relief from the duty to register after 10 years without a conviction; in (3)(b) near beginning of first sentence after "offender" inserted "required to register for life"; in (4) at beginning of second sentence after "proceeding" inserted "under subsection (3)(b)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2002 Amendment: Chapter 22 inserted (5)(a)(ii) exempting an offender from subsection (3) if the victim was under 12 years of age when the offense occurred; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective August 21, 2002.

Applicability: Section 9, Ch. 22, Sp. L. August 2002, provided: "[This act] applies to convictions on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective August 21, 2002.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 227 at beginning of (3) inserted exception clause; in (3)(b) deleted former second sentence that read: "If the offender was designated as a sexually violent predator under 46-23-509, the court is also required to find that the offender no longer suffers from a mental abnormality or personality disorder that makes the offender likely to engage in a predatory sexual offense"; inserted (5) outlining certain convicted sexual offenders who may not petition, after 10 years of registration, for an order relieving offender from duty to register; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 in (1), in three places, substituted reference to sexual offender for reference to person and after "under" substituted "this part shall register" for "46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part shall comply with 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part"; inserted (2) regarding registration time; in (3), in first sentence after "10 years", substituted "of registration" for "since the date of the offender's last conviction of a sexual or violent offense", after "petition" substituted "the sentencing court or the district court for the judicial district in which the offender resides" for "a district court", and at end deleted "under 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part"; in (3)(b) inserted second sentence requiring a finding that a designated sexually violent predator no longer suffers from a mental abnormality or personality disorder; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 407 in (1) substituted compliance for the rest of the person's life, except as provided in subsection (2), or during a period of time during which the person is in prison for compliance for 10 years after conviction if not imprisoned during those 10 years and for 10 years after release from prison if imprisoned during the initial 10 years; and substituted (2) relating to a petition for relief from registration and proceeding on the petition for former (2) that provided that the registration duty terminates 10 years after the initial registration if the person commits no act during that time requiring registration.

Chapter 550 in (1), near beginning after "part for", substituted "the remainder of the person's life, except as provided in subsection (2) of this section or during a period of time during which the person is in prison" for "a period of 10 years after conviction, if not imprisoned during that period. If a person required to register under 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part is imprisoned during the initial 10-year period, he shall comply with the provisions of 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part for a period of 10 years after release from prison"; and substituted (2) and (3) allowing a petition for relief from registration for former language that read: "A convicted sexual offender's duty to register under 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part terminates at the expiration of 10 years from the date of initial registration, provided that during the 10-year period the convicted sexual offender does not again become subject to 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part."

Code Commissioner Correction: In preparing the 1995 composite for this section, in (2) the words "or violent" were omitted from the first sentence. The omitted words were contained in Chapter 407, Laws of 1995, and should have been included. The Code Commissioner has inserted the erroneously omitted words.

Case Notes

Duty to Register After Expiration of Statutory Limit — Petition Process Unconstitutional: The defendant was charged with failure to register as a violent offender that stemmed from a conviction 15 years earlier. The defendant entered an Alford plea to the failure to register charge and was sentenced to a 5-year commitment with the Department of Corrections. The defendant then appealed his conviction and challenged the constitutionality of 46-23-506, which required offenders to petition to be relieved of the duty to register even when the statutory deadline requiring registration had expired. The Supreme Court exercised plain error review and held that the statutory petition process was arbitrary and capricious and violated due process. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and vacated the defendant's conviction. St. v. Sedler, 2020 MT 248, 401 Mont. 437, 473 P.3d 406.

Court Properly Denied Defendant Relief From Lifetime Registration Requirements: A victim's fears articulated to the court formed an appropriate basis for the court's decision that the defendant remained a threat to public safety and was not entitled to release from the requirement that he continue to register as a sex offender. Langford v. St., 2013 MT 265, 372 Mont. 14, 309 P.3d 993.

Requirement to Register as Sexual Offender — No Authority for District Court to Relieve Requirement Absent Compliance With Statute — District Court Affirmed: The defendant was required by the Youth Court to register as a sexual offender. He did not appeal that order. Upon reaching majority and having his case transferred from Youth Court to District Court, the defendant requested he be relieved of the requirement to register as a sexual offender. He argued that the requirement had been a condition of his sentence and, because he had complied with the terms of his probation and had been released from supervision, he should be relieved of the requirement to register. The District Court determined that it did not have authority to relieve him of the requirement to register at that time. The defendant appealed to the Supreme Court. In affirming the District Court decision, the Supreme Court noted that registration as a sexual offender is a stand-alone requirement and is not simply a general sentencing condition of probation. The Supreme Court also noted that under 46-23-506, the defendant, a level 1 sexual offender, cannot request relief from the requirement to register until he has been registered for 10 years. In re M.W., 2012 MT 44, 364 Mont. 211, 272 P.3d 112.

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to 41-5-1513, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under 46-18-201. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended 46-23-502 to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that 41-5-1513 suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

46-23-507. Penalty.Compiler's Comments

2021 Amendment: Chapter 227 inserted (2), (3), and (4) regarding vacating certain convictions for certain sexual or violent offenders; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2021.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 after "register" inserted "verify registration, or keep registration current" and after "under" deleted "46-18-254, 46-18-255, and".

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 407 near beginning inserted "or violent" and increased penalty from "not less than 90 days or a fine not to exceed $250, or both" to "not more than 5 years or may be fined not more than $10,000, or both".

Chapter 550 near end substituted "more than 5 years or may be fined not more than $10,000" for "less than 90 days or a fine not to exceed $250".

Case Notes

Duty to Register After Expiration of Statutory Limit — Petition Process Unconstitutional: The defendant was charged with failure to register as a violent offender that stemmed from a conviction 15 years earlier. The defendant entered an Alford plea to the failure to register charge and was sentenced to a 5-year commitment with the Department of Corrections. The defendant then appealed his conviction and challenged the constitutionality of 46-23-506, which required offenders to petition to be relieved of the duty to register even when the statutory deadline requiring registration had expired. The Supreme Court exercised plain error review and held that the statutory petition process was arbitrary and capricious and violated due process. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and vacated the defendant's conviction. St. v. Sedler, 2020 MT 248, 401 Mont. 437, 473 P.3d 406.

Connecticut Registered Sex Offender Required to Know Montana Registration Law: The defendant argued that the state had failed to prove that he had knowingly failed to register in Montana. The Supreme Court held that it was established law in Montana that ignorance of the law may not be used as a defense and the defendant had the obligation to determine if registration in Montana as a sex offender was required. St. v. Payne, 2011 MT 35, 359 Mont. 270, 248 P.3d 842.

Erroneous Reference to Offense in Charging Document — No Grounds for Reversal Absent Surprise or Prejudice: As a condition of sentencing, Bahr was required to maintain registration as a violent offender. Bahr was subsequently charged with failure to provide notice of a change of address, and the charge was later amended to failing to provide notice of a change of residence. At trial, Bahr asserted that the charge should be dismissed because the initial charging document cited an offense of failure to provide notice of a change of address that was not a crime. The District Court concluded that the charging document properly charged an offense under 46-23-507 and dismissed Bahr's argument. On appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The original information and the supporting affidavit clearly set out that Bahr was required to register as a violent offender, that the last registration was completed in Glacier County in 2002, and that Bahr had acknowledged the requirement to provide notice of any change but had failed to provide notice after moving from Glacier County and residing in Cascade County for over a month without updating the registration information. This was enough as a matter of law to apprise Bahr of the charges and to prevent any surprise. Even if there were errors in wording in the charging document, there was no ground for reversal unless Bahr demonstrated prejudice. Additionally, amendment of the information from "change of address" to "change of residence" was not substantive. Therefore, absent surprise or prejudice, the District Court properly declined to dismiss the charge. St. v. Bahr, 2009 MT 378, 353 M 294, 224 P3d 610 (2009), followed in St. v. E.M.R., 2013 MT 3, 368 Mont. 179, 292 P.3d 451.

Violation Upon Registrant's Failure to Notify Upon Move From Homeless Shelter to Streets: Samples was registered as a sexual offender while residing at a Billings homeless shelter. Samples moved out of the shelter but failed to notify authorities. Samples contended that he was not required to provide notice of a change of address because he moved from the shelter to the streets of the city and had no actual address. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 46-23-505, a registrant is required to provide notification of a change of residence, which Samples failed to do upon moving from the shelter. Because Samples failed to keep his registration current, he was subject to the penalty in 46-23-507. St. v. Samples, 2008 MT 416, 347 M 292, 198 P3d 803 (2008).

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protections: Wardell was convicted of felony sexual contact with a child in South Dakota and later was charged with numerous sexual crimes in Montana, including failure to register as a sex offender. The District Court sentenced Wardell to 5 years on the failure to register count and designated Wardell as a persistent felony offender, ultimately adding an additional 20-year consecutive sentence. Wardell appealed on grounds that the conviction for failure to register and the sentence for persistent felony offender constituted double jeopardy because each relied on the same underlying conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed. A sentence as a habitual criminal is not to be viewed as a new jeopardy. The sentence enhancement was related to the second crime—failure to register—and thus did not constitute double jeopardy. Under 46-18-501 (now repealed), the dual use of the prior South Dakota conviction for designating Wardell as a persistent felon was authorized. Further, it is not a crime to be a persistent felony offender, and being designated a persistent felony offender cannot constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Wardell, 2005 MT 252, 329 M 9, 122 P3d 443 (2005).

Use of Persistent Felony Offender Statute to Increase Sentence Not Considered Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Wardell was originally sentenced as a persistent felony offender to 45 years in prison with 30 years suspended. Wardell filed a petition for postconviction relief, and that sentence was vacated. Upon resentencing, Wardell's sentence was increased to 20 years suspended plus 5 years for failure to register as a sex offender. Wardell argued on appeal that the sentence constituted cruel and unusual punishment because it was excessive when compared to other sentences for failure to register. The Supreme Court noted that Wardell's sentence was within statutory maximum guidelines and was not so disproportionate to the crime as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community or of justice. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Wardell, 2005 MT 252, 329 M 9, 122 P3d 443 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003).

Sex Offender Registration and Disclosure Requirements Not Violative of Privacy or Right of Convicted to Restoration of Rights: Mount was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and served his sentence. Nine days after final discharge from prison in 1996, Mount registered as a sexual offender, but he was convicted in 2000 of failing to update the registration as required in this section. On appeal, Mount asserted that the ongoing registration and disclosure requirements of the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act violated the right to privacy under Art. II, sec. 10, Mont. Const., and constitutional and statutory provisions for reinstatement of the rights of a citizen under Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., and 46-18-801. The Supreme Court disagreed. As a fundamental right, the right to individual privacy may be infringed only by a compelling state interest; however, protection of the public from the recidivism of sex offenders, prevention of the victimization of vulnerable children, and assistance in keeping track of sex offenders constitute the requisite compelling interest. Further, Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., and 46-18-801 apply only to the restoration of civil and political rights, and a conviction for sexual intercourse without consent does not fall under this category of protected rights. Thus, Mount was not deprived of any rights by the registration and disclosure requirements of the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act. St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), followed in Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319 M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004).

In determining the method of dissemination, the disseminating entity should consider the level of risk posed by the offender to the public" for "A state or local law enforcement agency may use the internet to disseminate the information allowed by this section to the public"; inserted (4) requiring development of a model community notification policy; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 3, Ch. 254, L. 2007, were rendered void by sec. 6, Ch. 254, L. 2007, a coordination section.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 31, Ch. 483, L. 2007, provided: "[Sections 2, 3, and 19 through 24] [amending 41-5-216, 41-5-1513, 46-23-502, 46-23-504, 46-23-505, 46-23-506, 46-23-508, and 46-23-509] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

2001 Amendment: Chapter 222 inserted (3) authorizing state or local law enforcement agency to use internet to disseminate information. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 219 in (1)(a) after "name" inserted "and address"; in (1)(b)(ii)(A) substituted "the offender's address" for "the offender's approximate, but not exact, address, such as by stating the neighborhood, town, or part of a county"; in (1)(b)(iii) at end of first sentence deleted "except that the offender's exact address must be included"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 in (1), at beginning of introductory clause after "Information", deleted "in the register" and after "under" deleted "46-18-254"; in (1)(a), after "sexual", inserted "or violent"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) before releasing from a state prison an inmate who is a sexual offender, if the department believes that release of information concerning the inmate is necessary for public protection, the department shall petition the district court for the judicial district in which the prison is located or for the judicial district in which the inmate intends to reside for an order allowing the department to release relevant and necessary register information regarding the inmate to the public. The court shall grant the order if the court finds that the information is necessary for public protection"; inserted (1)(b) and (1)(c) regarding release of registration information; inserted (2) prohibiting release of the identity of a victim without permission; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

Attorney General's Opinions

Limit of Immunity Regarding Release of Sexual Offender Registration Information: Under 46-23-511, state and local agencies, private entities, and their employees are exempt from liability as a result of good faith decisions regarding the release of information on sexual offenders, but that immunity does not extend to gross negligence or willful or wanton misconduct. Pursuant to Russell v. Gregoire, 124 F3d 1079 (9th Cir. 1997), release of information is tailored to help the community protect itself from sexual predators under the guidance of law enforcement, not to punish sex offenders. 47 A.G. Op. 15 (1998).

Registration of Out-of-State Sexual Offenders — Information Subject to Disclosure: The general language of subsection (1)(b) of this section governs the dissemination of information regarding out-of-state sexual offenders who are registered in Montana. At a minimum, the name of the registered sexual offender may be disclosed. Additional information may be disclosed if the offender is determined to be a risk to the safety of the community and if disclosure of the additional information promotes public safety. The identity of a victim may not be released without the victim's permission. 47 A.G. Op. 15 (1998).

46-23-509. Psychosexual evaluations and sexual offender designations.

Compiler's Comments

2023 Amendment — Code Commissioner Correction: See 2023 Session Law for amendment made by sec. 6, Ch. 643, L. 2023. Amendment effective October 1, 2023.

In (5), the Code Commissioner substituted "46-23-502(10)(a)(xvii)" for "46-23-502(10)(q)" to correct an erroneous reference.

2021 Amendment: Chapter 481 deleted former (1) that read "The department shall adopt rules for the qualification of sexual offender evaluators who conduct psychosexual evaluations of sexual offenders and sexually violent predators and for determinations by sexual offender evaluators of the risk of a repeat offense and the threat that an offender poses to the public safety"; in (1) in introductory clause substituted "a sexual offender evaluator who has a license endorsement as provided for in 37-1-139" for "the department or a sexual offender evaluator"; in (5) near end after "a sexual offender evaluator who" substituted "has a license endorsement as provided for in 37-1-139" for "is a member of the Montana sex offender treatment association or has comparable credentials acceptable to the department of labor and industry"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective January 1, 2022.

2017 Amendment: Chapter 275 in (6) near end substituted "results of the psychosexual evaluation" for "results of the sex offender evaluation". Amendment effective October 1, 2017.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 110 in (1) substituted "psychosexual evaluations of sexual offenders and sexually violent predators" for "sexual offender and sexually violent predator evaluations"; in (2), (3)(a), and (8) substituted "psychosexual evaluation report" for "sexual offender evaluation report"; and in (6) inserted second, third, and fourth sentences concerning prior risk assessments and psychosexual evaluations. Amendment effective October 1, 2015.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 182 inserted (8) authorizing district courts to assign to a sex offender a level designation if the offender has none. Amendment effective October 1, 2013.

Applicability: Section 2, Ch. 182, L. 2013, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings begun on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2013.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 483 in (4) near end of first sentence after "offender" inserted "treatment"; in (5) near middle after "part" inserted "and who was sentenced prior to October 1, 1997"; in (6) substituted "46-23-502(9)(b)" for "46-23-502(6)(b)"; inserted (7) allowing the lack of a fixed residence to be considered as a factor in determining risk level; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 31, Ch. 483, L. 2007, provided: "[Sections 2, 3, and 19 through 24] [amending 41-5-216, 41-5-1513, 46-23-502, 46-23-504, 46-23-505, 46-23-506, 46-23-508, and 46-23-509] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

2005 Amendment: Chapter 313 in (4) near beginning of first sentence after second "offender" inserted "or given a level designation by another state, the federal government, or the department under subsection (6) that is determined by the court to be similar to level 2" and near middle after "sentencing court" inserted "or the district court for the judicial district in which the offender resides"; inserted (6) allowing the department of justice to give an offender the risk level designation assigned by another state or by the federal government in certain cases; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2002 Amendment: Chapter 22 in (4) near beginning after “level 2” deleted “or level 3”. Amendment effective August 21, 2002.

Applicability: Section 9, Ch. 22, Sp. L. August 2002, provided: “[This act] applies to convictions on or after [the effective date of this act].” Effective August 21, 2002.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 358 inserted (5) requiring the department to apply a level designation when the offender is released if the sentencing court did not apply a level designation at the time of sentencing; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: “The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995.”

Case Notes

Failure to Preserve Challenge to Level 3 Offender Designation — Lenihan Exception Does Not Apply — Statute Does Not Require Court to Make Specific Findings on Statutory Criteria. St. v. Pine, 2023 MT 172, 413 Mont. 254, 548 P.3d 390.

No New Presentence Investigation or Psychosexual Evaluation Required for Probation Revocation. Claassen, a level 1 sexual offender, violated the terms of his probation through the possession of child pornography. At his probation revocation hearing, the court elevated Claassen's offender status to level 3 without ordering a new presentence investigation or a psychosexual evaluation as required by 46-18-111 and 46-23-509. Because a parole violation is an administrative proceeding concerning the violation of the conditions of probation and not of the underlying offense, the court could properly sentence Claassen under 46-18-203 without a presentence investigation or a psychosexual evaluation. St. v. Claassen, 2012 MT 313, 367 Mont. 478, 291 P.3d 1176.

Error in Designation of Tier Level Upon Revocation of Probation — No Authority to Designate. The Department of Corrections (DOC) designated Tirey a level 1 sexual offender in 2008 in anticipation of his parole. The court did not specify a tier level when Tirey was originally convicted and sentenced in 1997. After Tirey's probation was revoked in 2009, the District Court designated Tirey a level 2 sexual offender, but under this section the DOC is required to designate the tier level when the offender is released if the judge did not apply a tier level during the original sentencing. The District Court erred when it subsequently designated a tier level upon revoking Tirey's probation. St. v. Tirey, 2010 MT 283, 358 Mont. 510, 247 P.3d 701.

Plea Not Considered Involuntary Based on Defendant's Belief in Designation as Low-Level Sexual Offender. Brinson entered a plea agreement stating that he would be sentenced to 20 years suspended if he completed a sexual offender evaluation with an evaluator certified by the Montana Sex Offender Treatment Association (MSOTA) and if the evaluator concluded that Brinson was a low risk to reoffend. However, if Brinson was not found to be a low risk, the parties would be free to argue for an appropriate sentence. Brinson received two evaluations. A non-MSOTA evaluator found Brinson to be a level 1 low-risk offender, but an MSOTA evaluator concluded that Brinson was a level 2 moderate-risk offender. The sentencing court held that because Brinson was not found to be a low risk by an MSOTA evaluator, the suspended sentence provisions of the plea agreement did not apply. The court subsequently adopted the recommendation in the presentence investigation report and sentenced Brinson to 20 years in prison with 10 years suspended. Brinson appealed on grounds that he was misled by the plea bargain, however slightly, so withdrawal of the guilty plea was warranted. The Supreme Court disagreed. The court disapproved the “however slightly” language in the analysis of the voluntariness of a plea. Even though Brinson's expectations were bolstered by the low-level evaluation 3 months after his plea, those subsequent expectations were irrelevant to whether the plea was voluntary when entered. Even though Brinson may have had a good faith belief that he would ultimately be designated a low-risk offender, he presented no objective proof that he was assured of receiving that designation. In fact, the plea agreement was clear that a low-risk designation might not be forthcoming, so Brinson's argument that the plea was involuntary because it was induced by a misrepresentation or an unfulfillable promise was unpersuasive. The sentencing court did not err in denying Brinson's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Brinson, 2009 MT 200, 351 M 136, 210 P3d 164 (2009), overruling St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), and St. v. Deserly, 2008 MT 242, 344 M 468, 188 P3d 1057 (2008), regarding applicability of the “however slightly” language in the analysis of the voluntariness of a plea.

No Error in Level 3 Sex Offender Designation: Hill asserted error in the District Court's designation of Hill as a level 3 sexual offender. A District Court makes a sexual offender designation in the exercise of the court's discretion, and in this case the court did not abuse its discretion given Hill's: (1) history of multiple sexual contacts with young children of both sexes spanning at least 7 years; (2) admission of multiple sexual assaults; (3) failure of two sexual offender treatment programs; (4) commission of a sexual felony following return to the community; (5) high risk to reoffend; (6) danger to the community; and (7) need for lifelong supervision. St. v. Hill, 2009 MT 134, 350 M 296, 207 P3d 307 (2009).

Sentence Not Based on Materially Inaccurate Information Affirmed: Following conviction on a sexual assault charge, Hirt was sentenced as a level 3 sexual offender. Hirt contended that the sentence was erroneous because it was based in part on materially inaccurate information that Hirt had three prior felony convictions, when in fact Hirt had only one prior felony conviction. However, the sentencing judge knew at sentencing that Hirt had one prior felony conviction, not three as stated in the original presentence investigation (PSI) report, because the information had been corrected in a subsequent PSI report. The level 3 designation was based on a number of considerations besides Hirt's prior criminal history, including Hirt's drug and alcohol abuse, mental health history, misuse of prescription medication, credibility, and failure to assume responsibility for his actions. The sentencing judge was not bound by the level 3 recommendation and was required to and did make an independent decision on the issue after considering the range of relevant and material factors presented in the sentencing record. Thus, the sentencing court did not rely on misinformation, and the information in the PSI was true, so there was no error or violation of Hirt's due process rights. Hirt v. St., 2009 MT 116, 350 M 162, 206 P3d 908 (2009).

Parole Restriction Based on Defendant's Danger to Society Warranted: Following conviction for kidnapping and sexual assault, Dunning was sentenced to 10 years in prison and designated as ineligible for parole. Dunning argued on appeal that the parole restriction was unwarranted, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Two psychosexual evaluations confirmed Dunning's high risk to reoffend equivalent to a level 3 offender, and Dunning remained an untreated sexual offender who was considered a danger to society based on a 30-year history of sexually related offenses. The factual evidence presented to the sentencing court provided a sufficient basis to support the court's conclusion that the parole restriction was proper. St. v. Dunning, 2008 MT 427, 347 M 443, 198 P3d 828 (2008).

Offender Entitled to Opportunity to Contest Sex Offender Designation — Liberty Interest at Stake: Samples contended that his due process rights were violated when the Department of Corrections assigned him a level 3 offender designation without notice, a hearing, or an opportunity to contest the designation. The Supreme Court agreed. In the context of a criminal sentence in Montana, it is not the duration or severity of a sentence that might render it unconstitutional, it is the imposition of a sentence based on a foundation that might be extensively and materially false and that a prisoner has no opportunity to correct that can result in a due process violation. There is a liberty interest at stake when a person is designated as a particular risk level for registration purposes because the level of designation places varying requirements on an offender to update the registration or face criminal sanctions. Therefore, Samples was denied due process in this case because he did not have the opportunity to know what information was used to designate the risk level, nor was he given the right to contest that information or the chance to argue for a different designation. The court remanded to allow Samples an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information used in the designation of his sexual offender risk level. St. v. Samples, 2008 MT 416, 347 M 292, 198 P3d 803 (2008).

Sentence Based on Recommendation of Sexual Offender Evaluator — State Breach of Plea Agreement by Presenting Conflicting Testimony of Different Evaluator: In a plea agreement, the state agreed to recommend one sentence if Rahn was designated by a sexual offender evaluator as a level 2 or lower offender and a harsher sentence if Rahn was designated as a level 3 offender. An evaluator who personally evaluated Rahn opined that Rahn should be designated as a level 2 offender. At the sentencing hearing, the state presented testimony by a different evaluator, who had not evaluated Rahn, attacking the level 2 designation and arguing that Rahn should be designated as a level 3 offender. Rahn objected on grounds that the state witness's testimony breached the plea agreement, but the sentencing court overruled the objection and subsequently designated Rahn as a level 3 offender and imposed the harsher sentence. Rahn appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Rahn complied with the plea agreement, but the state's conduct in presenting alternate testimony and recommending a level 3 designation was not what was agreed upon in the plea bargain; therefore, the state breached the plea agreement. The state was obligated to make the recommendation as agreed upon in the plea bargain, and the Supreme Court remanded for resentencing with a different judge pursuant to the terms of the plea agreement. St. v. Rahn, 2008 MT 201, 344 M 110, 187 P3d 622 (2008).

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), and St. v. Heafner, 2010 MT 87, 356 Mont. 128, 231 P.3d 1087 regarding authority of sentencing court.

Petition for Redesignation of Level 3 Sexual Offender Status Applicable to Convictions Prior to August 21, 2002: Bullman was sentenced under the 1999 version of this section that allowed a level 2 or level 3 offender to petition for a change in the offender designation upon completion of a sexual offender program. Bullman was designated as a level 3 offender and petitioned for a change in designation in 2006. However, in 2002, the Legislature amended this section to allow only level 2 offenders to petition for a change in designation, so the District Court denied Bullman's petition. The Supreme Court reversed. The 2002 amendment applies only to convictions on or after August 21, 2002, and does not apply retroactively, so Bullman was entitled to petition for redesignation. The case was remanded for the District Court to determine whether Bullman qualified for redesignation. St. v. Bullman, 2007 MT 288, 339 M 461, 171 P3d 681 (2007).

Department of Corrections Assignment of Offender Level if Not Designated by Sentencing Court: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred in failing to designate a sexual offender risk level at the time of sentencing. The Supreme Court found that the sentencing court erred in failing to designate a level, but the error did not warrant remand because this section provides its own remedy by allowing the Department of Corrections to assign an offender level at the time of an offender's release from confinement if the sentencing court fails to do so. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Attorney General's Opinions

Limit of Immunity Regarding Release of Sexual Offender Registration Information: Under this section, state and local agencies, private entities, and their employees are exempt from liability as a result of good faith decisions regarding the release of information on sexual offenders, but that immunity does not extend to gross negligence or willful or wanton misconduct. Pursuant to Russell v. Gregoire, 124 F3d 1079 (9th Cir. 1997), release of information is tailored to help the community protect itself from sexual predators under the guidance of law enforcement, not to punish sex offenders. 47 A.G. Defendant's Agreement in Plea Bargain That Included Possibility of Sex Offender Registration — Authority of Sentencing Court to Include Registration as Sentencing Condition: Grana was convicted of multiple burglaries, which would not otherwise require registration as a sexual offender. However, Grana acknowledged that he entered the homes to commit "sexually offensive acts against the occupants", and Grana's original plea agreement provided that the District Court could require sex offender registration, subject to Grana's right to argue that registration was not appropriate. Grana agreed to and obtained the full benefit of the plea bargain, which was sufficient to bring the case within the authority of 46-23-512 and to authorize the District Court to require registration as a sentencing condition as a matter of law. St. v. Grana, 2009 MT 250, 351 M 499, 213 P3d 783 (2009). See also In re T.M.L., 2012 MT 9, 363 Mont. 304, 268 P.3d 1255.

Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Applicability: Section 16, Ch. 333, L. 1975, read: "The provisions of sections 82A-116 through 82A-122 are applicable to this act."

Case Notes

Revocation of Parole or Probation Not Considered Punishment for Double Jeopardy Purposes: Revocation is a supervisory act involving the enforcement of conditions imposed on a term of parole or probation. Therefore, the same act or acts may form the basis for revoking both an offender's parole and an ensuing suspended sentence without contravening double jeopardy protections. Here, Haagenson was granted conditional release and a suspended sentence subject to certain conditions, including a requirement that he remain law abiding and not consume alcohol. Haagenson subsequently violated these conditions and thus forfeited both the conditional release and the future suspended sentence. St. v. Haagenson, 2010 MT 95, 356 Mont. 177, 232 P.3d 367, distinguishing St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 Mont. 394, 188 P.3d 1034, and St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 Mont. 93, 193 P.3d 925.

Restriction on Financial Transactions as Condition for Suspended Sentence for Sexual Assault Affirmed: As a condition for a suspended sentence for sexual assault of a child, Hernandez was required to obtain permission from the probation officer before engaging in financial transactions to finance or purchase a vehicle, engage in business, or incur debt. Hernandez appealed on grounds that the condition was unrelated to the crime. The Supreme Court noted that the sentencing condition was authorized by statute and Department of Corrections rule, so the Ashby requirement of a nexus to the offender or the offense did not apply. The financial transaction restriction was considered a standard condition of the Department, and Hernandez offered nothing indicating that the condition would impose a hardship; because Hernandez's priority financial obligations while serving the suspended sentence would be restitution, child support, fines, and fees, the imposition of the condition was appropriate and not an abuse of discretion. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Hernandez, 2009 MT 341, 353 M 111, 220 P.3d 25 (2009), followed in St. v. Holt, 2011 MT 42, 359 Mont. 308, 249 P.3d 470.

Entry of Intensive Supervision Program Officer Into Probationer's Home Without Consent Unlawful — Information Gathered Via Search Admissible as Independent Source or Inevitable Discovery Exceptions to Fruit of Poisonous Tree Doctrine: As a condition of suspended sentencing, Therriault was placed in the intensive supervision program (ISP). Near the end of the program, Therriault's supervising officer, McCarty, arrived at Therriault's residence for a routine check. Although Therriault was not there, McCarty entered the residence and found, in plain view, what he thought might be a note for him from Therriault, but which turned out to be a high school registration form for a female student. McCarty then went to Therriault's sister's home next door. Therriault's sister informed McCarty that she had seen a girl at Therriault's home during the prior 2 weeks and inquired about the lawful age of consent. McCarty then reentered Therriault's home and reviewed the form, discovering that the applicant was 14 years old. McCarty left a note for Therriault to contact him and left the residence but returned later that night to discover a 14-year-old girl in Therriault's basement. Upon petition to revoke his probation, Therriault alleged that the discovery directly resulted from an illegal search and seizure and moved to suppress all evidence under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. The District Court denied the motion, revoked Therriault's suspended sentence, and sentenced him to prison for the remainder of the term. Therriault appealed. The state contended that as a participant in ISP, Therriault enjoyed little or no expectation of privacy and that McCarty's conduct did not constitute a search. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that ISP is merely a rigid condition imposed on certain probationers and that it is the sentencing tribunal, not the ISP officer, that establishes the conditions for any search of the probationer's person or property and that any ISP rules, terms or conditions, or means of supervision that conflict with a court-ordered condition of probation will be superseded by the court's conditions. The state misconstrued Therriault's expectation of privacy under ISP because the court's probationary condition stated that Therriault would submit his residence "to search at any time by lawful authorities upon reasonable request of his Probation Officer", so Therriault could expect that an intrusion into the privacy of his home would not occur unless McCarty had reasonable cause and first posed a reasonable request. Accordingly, McCarty's conduct constituted an illegal search and evidence obtained through the unlawful conduct would not generally be admissible under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. However, under St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919 (1996), such derivative evidence is admissible if it is: (1) attenuated from the constitutional violation so as to remove its primary taint; (2) obtained from an independent source; or (3) determined to be evidence that would have been inevitably discovered apart from the constitutional violation. In this case, the second exception applied. McCarty received independent incriminating evidence from Therriault's sister; thus, it was not the tainted evidence of the girl's name or age or the fact that she was transferring to a different school that led to her discovery, but rather the independent information that a girl of questionable age had been residing with Therriault. This irrefutable evidence, ascertained through a source sufficiently independent of McCarty's unlawful conduct, warranted exclusion from the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. The District Court's revocation of Therriault's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Therriault, 2000 MT 286, 302 M 189, 14 P3d 444, 57 St. Rep. 1185 (2000).

2017 Amendment: Chapter 392 in (1)(a) in second sentence substituted "subsection (1)(b)" for "2-15-2302(2)(c)"; inserted (1)(b) concerning substitution of work experience; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2017.

Applicability: Section 23, Ch. 392, L. 2017, provided: "[This act] applies to hearings conducted under Title 46, chapter 23, parts 2 or 3, and parole supervision and revocation hearings conducted under Title 46, chapter 23, part 10, on or after [the effective date of this section]." Effective July 1, 2017.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 209 in (1) in second sentence substituted "2-15-2302(2)(c)" for "2-15-2302(2)"; and in (2) in first sentence after "probation officers" inserted provision regarding training on serious mental illness and recovery. Amendment effective October 1, 2013.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 506 in (2) in first sentence at end substituted reference to Montana public safety officer standards and training council for "board of crime control, as provided in 44-4-301" and in second sentence substituted "council" for "board"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2007.

Saving Clause: Section 24, Ch. 506, L. 2007, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment: Inserted second and third sentences in (2) providing that each probation and parole officer must receive training and that training must be at the law enforcement academy.

1987 Amendment: In (1), near beginning of first sentence after "college degree and", deleted "shall have received at least"; and inserted (2) requiring probation and parole officers to receive 16 hours of approved training a year.

2017 Amendment: Chapter 199 in (6) after "staff" inserted "including initial training on risk assessment and evidence-based practices for new probation and parole officers and regular training for all probation and parole officers" and inserted second sentence concerning performance reviews; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2017.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 114 in (8) substituted "Interstate Compact for Adult Offender Supervision" for "interstate compact for the supervision of parolees and probationers". Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 493 at end of first sentence inserted "for felony offenders". Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 493, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who are under the custody or supervision of the department of corrections on [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 1, 2001.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 499 inserted (9) requiring notification of an employer if a probationer or parolee has been convicted of theft from an employer; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

No Statutory Authority of District Court to Restrict Future Interstate Compact Agreements: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was a restriction on Muhammad's ability to enter future interstate compact agreements. The state conceded that the District Court lacked authority to approve interstate compact agreements, but asserted that the court did have the authority to condition Muhammad's sentence in such a way as to require sexual offender treatment if Muhammad's probation supervision was transferred to another state. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under this section, it is the duty of the Department of Corrections to administer interstate compacts for the supervision of probationers. Therefore, the requirement that Montana treatment providers and the District Court approve any interstate compact agreement was vacated. However, the Supreme Court did note that the District Court was not precluded from requiring that Muhammad complete a program that was equivalent to a Montana program if supervision was transferred to another state. The order was remanded to the District Court to allow modification to provide for that condition. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002).

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 360, L. 2005, provided: "WHEREAS, the United States Department of Justice has published confirmed statistics that over 60% of serious and violent offenders in state prisons have a history of prior convictions and that the number of prisoners convicted for violent sexual assault has increased by an annual rate of 15% each year since 1980; and

WHEREAS, criminals who commit sexual and violent crimes have shown unusually high recidivism rates, thereby posing an unacceptable level of risk to the community; and

WHEREAS, intensive supervision of sexual or violent offenders is a crucial element to both the rehabilitation of the released convicts and the safety of the surrounding community; and

WHEREAS, mature technological solutions now exist to provide improved supervision and behavioral control of sexual or violent offenders following their release; and

WHEREAS, these solutions can now also provide law enforcement and correctional professionals with significant new tools for electronic correlation of the constantly updated geographical location of supervised sexual or violent offenders following their release with the geographic location of reported crimes, both to possibly link released offenders to crimes or to possibly exclude released offenders from ongoing criminal investigations; and

WHEREAS, continuous 24-hour-a-day, 7-day-a-week electronic monitoring of those convicted of sexual offenses is a valuable and reasonable requirement for those convicts who are placed on probation, who failed to register as sexual or violent offenders as required by law, or who have been released from incarceration while they remain under the active supervision of the state.”

2021 Amendment: Chapter 566 in (6) after “the probation and parole officer shall” substituted “notify the probationer of eligibility for” for “recommend”; deleted for (6)(a), (6)(b), (6)(c), and (6)(d) regarding timelines for classes of probationers (see 2021 Session Law for former text); inserted (6)(a) regarding the women’s risks and needs assessment; inserted (6)(b) regarding timelines for classes of probationers under the Montana offender reentry and risk assessment; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2021.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 566, L. 2021, provided: “WHEREAS, the Legislature is concerned with the delays associated with transferring defendants to state custody after imposition of sentence. When the Department of Corrections does not timely assume custody of defendants after sentencing, local government facilities may lack capacity to hold other persons. It is the expectation of the Legislature that the Department of Corrections will ensure that defendants sentenced for one or more felonies will not remain in a county detention facility for more than 10 business days after sentencing unless unusual circumstances arise; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Department of Corrections, the Legislature has been advised that the vocational opportunities at the Montana Women’s Prison are inadequate, particularly when compared to the offerings at the Montana State Men’s Prison. The Legislature is mindful that the campuses may face different limitations in what programming may be offered based on location, footprint, and facilities; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Department of Corrections, the Legislature is concerned with the findings of the Legislative Audit Division in 2020 that the Department of Corrections had drug treatment beds that were not fully utilized in fiscal year 2019, which resulted in a payment for failure to allow the contractor to operate at 75% capacity; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Department of Corrections, the Legislature is concerned that the Department of Corrections has yet to fully implement statutory directives to measure the effectiveness of its programs—both those provided by the Department of Corrections employees and those provided by contractors. In 2017, the Legislature directed the Department of Corrections to conduct evaluations of programs to determine their impact on reducing recidivism. This work, in addition to other requirements in Senate Bill No. 59 (2017), appears to be unaddressed or incomplete. Moreover, the Department of Corrections’ definition of recidivism is an inadequate measure for the determination of effectiveness of its programming. The Legislature is interested in having data on crimes committed by those discharged from the Department of Corrections’ custody, not merely “the rate at which adult offenders return to prison in Montana for any reason within three years of their release from prison”, which fails to address reentry outcomes of many individuals committed to the Department of Corrections’ custody and evaluates a truncated time period; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Office of State Public Defender, the Legislature is concerned with the findings of the Legislative Audit Division in 2020 regarding billing practices by contractors, including the failure to require the use of assistants for nonattorney tasks, and allowing contractors to work a number of hours each year that may induce attorneys to be contractors instead of the Office of State Public Defender employees; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Office of State Public Defender, it is the sense of the Legislature that the Office of State Public Defender expends its appropriation, in part, to perform tasks that are not required by the state or federal constitution or by statutory directive, such as in section 47-1-104(4), MCA. Given limited resources and the demands on the Office of State Public Defender staff, the Legislature believes that it is incumbent on the Office of State Public Defender management to limit the scope of its work to what is required by statute and the constitution; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Office of State Public Defender, neither through its employees nor its contractors should the Office of State Public Defender impair the Legislature's intent to have defendants share in the costs of counsel provided by the Office of State Public Defender. The Office of State Public Defender employees and contractors should not move the court to waive assessments under section 46-8-113, MCA, unless the defendant can show a compelling reason why they cannot pay this assessment over the course of the sentence; and

WHEREAS, in House Bill No. 640 (2019), the Legislature established a mechanism to ensure that sexual abuse reports generated by those with mandatory reporting responsibilities are provided to county attorneys and that county attorneys report to the Attorney General on the status of the investigations and prosecutions generated from these referrals. It is the sense of the Legislature that the Department of Justice has not undertaken a thorough review of the reports generated pursuant to section 41-3-210(3), MCA, and the Legislature urges the Department of Justice to do so; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has taken a number of steps to strengthen the laws and investigative response to address human trafficking and sexual exploitation of minors. Given the collective commitment in the legislative and executive branches to combat these crimes, the Legislature needs greater clarity on whether its appropriations and statutory changes are having an impact; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature expresses its concern that the backlog of testing on sexual assault kits must be eliminated as soon as possible; and

WHEREAS, the definition of recidivism utilized by the judicial branch in evaluating the effectiveness of treatment courts is different than the definition used by the Department of Corrections for its programming, making it difficult to compare the effectiveness of treatment courts to in-patient treatment. It is the sense of the Legislature that a single definition of recidivism would make it possible to have a consistent evaluation of effectiveness; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature believes that expungement of a conviction for driving under the influence of drugs or alcohol will impair the correctional and public safety goals that the Legislature aims to achieve through the Section D appropriation."

2019 Amendment: Chapter 380 in (6) near end after "recommend conditional discharge" inserted "from supervision"; in (6)(b) substituted "moderate-risk probationer" for "medium-risk probationer"; in (6)(c) substituted "medium-risk probationer" for "moderate-risk probationer"; inserted (7) regarding filing a motion recommending conditional discharge and required contents of the motion; inserted (8) regarding motion service of process and no requirement to file an accompanying brief; inserted (9) regarding notification of the victim, a copy of the motion, written notice, the date, time, and place of any motion hearing, and the victim's option to appear and testify at any motion hearing; in (10)(a) at beginning of first sentence substituted "The court may hold a hearing on the motion. A" for "On recommendation of the probation and parole officer, a"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 8, 2019.

2017 Amendment: Chapter 391 in (4) inserted "using effective communication strategies and other evidence-based practices"; inserted (6)(a) concerning recommended conditional discharge conditions; deleted former (6)(c) that read: "(c) If the department certifies to the sentencing judge that the workload of a district probation and parole office has exceeded the optimum workload for the district over the preceding 60 days, the judge may not place an offender on probation under supervision by that district office unless the judge grants a conditional discharge to a probationer being supervised by that district office. The department may recommend probationers to the judge for conditional discharge. The judge may accept or reject the recommendations of the department. The department shall determine the optimum workload for each district probation and parole office"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 19, 2017.

2015 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 113 inserted (2) providing that a person convicted of a sexual offense may be restricted from contacting the victim or victim's family as a condition of probation; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2015.

Chapter 285 in (1) and (4)(e) deleted references to 45-5-310 and 45-5-311; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2015.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 374 in (1) in first sentence and in (4)(e) inserted references to 45-5-310 and 45-5-311 and substituted "45-5-603(2)(b)" for "45-5-603(2)(c)". Amendment effective July 1, 2013.

Applicability: Section 19, Ch. 374, L. 2013, provided: "[This act] applies to offenses committed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective July 1, 2013.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 483 in (1) near beginning of first sentence after "period" inserted "including supervision after release from imprisonment imposed pursuant to 45-5-503(4), 45-5-507(5), 45-5-601(3), 45-5-602(3), 45-5-603(2)(c), or 45-5-625(4)"; in (4)(e) at beginning inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 493 in (1) in first sentence near beginning after "shall supervise" substituted "probationers" for "offenders" and inserted second, third, and fourth sentences regarding hearing for purposes of setting conditions of probation; in (2) in first sentence at end after "signed by the probationer" substituted second sentence regarding waiver of extradition for remainder of first sentence and former second sentence that read: "and given to the probationer and the probationer's probation and parole officer, who shall report on the probationer's progress under rules of the sentencing judge. Any probation agreement signed by the probationer may contain a clause waiving extradition"; in (4)(a) in first sentence near middle after "may modify" inserted "or add" and deleted former second sentence that read: "Notice must be given to the probation and parole officer before any condition is modified, and the officer must be given an opportunity to present the officer's ideas or recommendations on any modification"; inserted (4)(b) through (4)(e) regarding modification or addition of conditions of probation; in (4)(f) substituted text regarding conditions of probation and condition of restitution for former text that read: "A copy of a modification of conditions must be delivered to the probation and parole officer and the probationer. Waiver or modification of restitution may be ordered only as provided under the provisions of 46-18-246"; deleted former (5) that read: "(5) The probation and parole officer shall keep records as the department or the sentencing judge may require"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 493, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who are under the custody or supervision of the department of corrections on [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 1, 2001.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to sentencing judge for references to court; in (1) substituted "offenders" for "persons"; in (2) inserted second sentence allowing a clause waiving extradition in a probation agreement; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 505 inserted (6)(a)(ii) authorizing court to conditionally discharge probationer from supervision before expiration of sentence if offender has paid restitution and court-ordered financial obligations; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

Applicability: Section 13(2), Ch. 505, L. 1999, provided: "[Section 2] [46-23-1011] applies to all persons under probation or parole supervision on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 28, 1999.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 125 at end of (4) inserted sentence relating to waiver or modification of restitution; at end of (6)(a) inserted phrase relating to unreasonable risk of danger to victim; and made minor changes in style.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 579 inserted (6)(c) providing that if the Department certifies to a court that the probation and parole office workload has exceeded the optimum, the court cannot place an offender on probation unless it grants a conditional discharge to a probationer, that the Department may recommend a conditional discharge, and that the court need not accept the recommendation; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1993.

1989 Amendment: Inserted (6) regarding conditional discharge; and made minor change in punctuation.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 195, L. 1989, provided: “[This act] applies to persons under probation or parole supervision on or after [the effective date of this act].” Effective October 1, 1989.

Administrative Rules

Title 20, chapter 25, subchapter 7, ARM Release on supervision.

Case Notes

Sentencing Condition Proper — Court Not Required to Determine Ability to Pay Costs: The District Court did not err when it imposed a condition in the presentence investigation report without first determining whether the defendant was financially able to pay the costs of imprisonment, probation, or alcohol treatment. On appeal, the defendant argued that the court was obligated to calculate, or at least estimate, the anticipated sum of the costs and to more thoroughly inquire into his financial assets, debts, recurring obligations, and future ability to pay. The Supreme Court affirmed the order, holding that the imposition of the condition complied with the plain language of 61-8-731 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) and that the District Court had properly deferred to the Department of Corrections the responsibility for assessing the defendant’s ability to pay. St. v. Daricek, 2018 MT 31, 390 Mont. 273, 412 P.3d 1044.

Escape From Custody Before Serving Sentence — Revocation of Suspension Proper — No Due Process Concern — Choice by Defendant Not to Learn About Probation Conditions When He Escaped: The defendant pleaded guilty to various charges and was sentenced to 20 years with the Department of Corrections, with 10 years suspended. While awaiting transfer to prison, the defendant escaped custody and was found 14 years later in Oregon, where he was serving time for unrelated crimes. During a revocation hearing in Montana, the District Court revoked the defendant’s suspended sentence based on his escape and numerous other felonies. On appeal, the Supreme Court rejected the defendant’s argument that he did not violate his suspended sentence because he escaped before the sentence started. In affirming the suspension, the court reasoned that the 2011 Legislature retroactively amended 46-18-203 to allow revocation of a suspended sentence before the period of suspension has begun. The Supreme Court also rejected the defendant’s due process argument that he did not sign and receive a copy of his conditions of probation, as required by 46-23-1011. The court reasoned that the defendant was not denied due process but instead had declined due process when he escaped. St. v. Graves, 2015 MT 262, 381 Mont. 37, 355 P.3d 769.

No Review of Revocation of Suspended Sentence Due to Lack of Justiciable Controversy: Defendant’s admission that he viewed pornography violated conditions imposed under 46-23-1011. The defendant did not challenge the revocation of his suspended sentence based on the conditions that were violated. The Supreme Court declined to review the defendant’s collateral challenges to the revocation because the claims were not justiciable. St. v. Savage, 2011 MT 23, 359 Mont. 207, 248 P.3d 308.

Failure to Object to Constitutionality of Probation Condition, Constituting Waiver of Issue on Appeal: When LaFreniere was sentenced for sexual intercourse without consent, the sentencing court did not attach any probation conditions. The County Attorney subsequently petitioned the court to add probation conditions pursuant to this section, one of which was that LaFreniere complete sex offender treatment. LaFreniere objected to that condition on grounds that he couldn’t afford it, but the District Court nevertheless imposed the treatment requirement along with 14 other probation conditions. LaFreniere later appealed on grounds that imposition of the treatment condition violated the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws. Without addressing the constitutional argument, the Supreme Court affirmed. By failing to raise the constitutional argument in District Court, LaFreniere waived the issue for purposes of appeal. St. v. LaFreniere, 2008 MT 99, 342 M 309, 180 P3d 1161 (2008).

Error in Revoking Suspended Sentence for Refusal to Sign Rules of Probation: In 1993, Gillingham, a resident of Canada, was convicted of five felonies and sentenced to 10 years on each count with the sentences suspended on certain conditions, one of which was a requirement that Gillingham sign a copy of the conditions of probation. Before Gillingham could sign, he was deported to Canada. Gillingham’s probation officer sent a copy of the conditions to Canada for Gillingham’s signature. The document contained the conditions imposed at sentencing, but also included an additional condition not imposed at sentencing, requiring that Gillingham waive extradition from Canada. Gillingham refused to sign the document with the new extradition condition, so in 1996, the state filed a petition to revoke Gillingham’s suspended sentence because of his refusal to sign. In 1998, the state submitted a supplemental petition to revoke the sentence based on three additional violations of sentencing conditions. Gillingham was finally extradited to Missoula County in 2004, and the District Court considered the petition to revoke Gillingham's sentence. The court found that Gillingham had violated the condition of his sentence requiring that he sign a document containing the rules of probation, revoked Gillingham's sentence, and sentenced him to 45 years at the state prison. Gillingham appealed the sentence revocation, and the Supreme Court agreed that revocation based on this issue was error. At the time that the charged offenses occurred and the sentences were imposed, the Department of Corrections had the authority to require that a probationer sign the conditions of probation, but the Department did not have the authority to add to the conditions of probation the requirement that a probationer waive extradition because that authority was not added to this section until the 2001 legislative session. Therefore, the District Court did not have the authority to revoke Gillingham's sentence based on Gillingham's refusal to sign a copy of probation conditions containing a provision that the court did not impose. St. v. Gillingham, 2008 MT 38, 341 M 325, 176 P3d 1075 (2008).

Modification of Probation Conditions to Include Intensive Supervision Program Affirmed — Modification Not Punitive or Change to Original Sentence: Following a conviction for felony incest, Griffin served one-half of his sentence and was released on parole. A probation officer recommended that Griffin complete the intensive supervision program (ISP) to assist in reentering the community. Griffin signed a formal request to modify the conditions of parole to include the ISP, and the District Court approved the modification. Griffin moved to set the order aside 1 day later after consulting an attorney, claiming that the probation officer had coerced Griffin into signing the request for modification. Finding no evidence of coercion and noting that Griffin had consented to the request for modification, the District Court denied the motion to set aside, and Griffin appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Although the order modified the conditions of Griffin's supervision, it did not modify Griffin's punishment, so Griffin's due process, double jeopardy, and ex post facto rights were not implicated. Griffin's original sentence contemplated the ISP as one of the conditions of a suspended sentence, so the order to successfully complete the ISP was not a change to the original sentence, but rather ensured Griffin's compliance with the terms of the original sentence. The District Court did not err in denying the motion to set aside the order modifying probation conditions. St. v. Griffin, 2007 MT 289, 339 M 465, 172 P3d 1223 (2007).

Oral and Written Versions of Original Sentence Requiring Outpatient Sexual Offender Treatment — Violation of Suspended Sentence: The District Court revoked Van Haele's suspended sentence on grounds that he failed to qualify for outpatient sexual offender treatment. Van Haele contended that the sentencing condition was improperly added by amendment and that he was entitled to a hearing on the added condition because it was not part of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The requirement could not have been added to the original sentence because it was part of the original oral and written sentence, so no hearing was required. The basis for revoking Van Haele's suspended sentence was therefore not invalid, and suspension was affirmed. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Alleged Inadequate Supervision of Parolee No Excuse for Probation Violation: Senn's parole supervision was transferred to Washington state, and after several years the Missoula County Attorney filed a petition to revoke Senn's suspended sentences based on several alleged probation violations. Senn admitted violating some of the probation conditions, but contended that the violations should be excused because of health problems, poverty, arrests in Washington that precluded contact with Montana, a good faith assumption that matters in Montana could be resolved after the criminal issues in Washington were addressed, and the Montana parole officer's failure to provide adequate supervision. The Supreme Court disagreed. Senn's own conduct resulted in the probation violations, and although there was a period when Senn was unsupervised, even when supervised Senn failed to comply with the probation officer's requests. The District Court did not err in revoking Senn's suspended sentences. St. v. Senn, 2003 MT 52, 314 M 348, 66 P3d 288 (2003).

Reasonable Cause for Search of Probationer — Motion to Suppress Evidence of Search Properly Denied: As a condition of a suspended sentence for conviction of felony sale of drugs, Roper consented to warrantless searches of his person, vehicle, or residence. Roper was subsequently granted a conditional discharge from state supervision of his probation because he was serving a concurrent probation as a result of a federal criminal conviction. However, despite the conditional discharge, the state reserved the right to warrantless searches and drug checks during the term of the state probationary sentence, and Roper was relieved only of the requirement to report to the state probation officer monthly. After a few months, the state probation officer became concerned that Roper was both using and selling drugs when two clients reported Roper's continued involvement with drugs. An informant told investigators that Roper stored drugs in a black leather pouch. Based on the gathered information and the close proximity of Roper's workplace to a school, the probation officer believed that reasonable cause existed to search Roper and, with other police officers, went to Roper's workplace and observed him outside involved in what appeared to be a drug transaction. They searched Roper but found no drugs in his possession. The officers went into the workplace and conducted a urinalysis on Roper, which tested positive. While there, the officers noticed a black leather pouch next to Roper's work gloves, seized it, and discovered methamphetamine. Roper was arrested, and the officers went to his house where additional drug evidence was discovered and seized. Roper moved to suppress all the evidence found at both his workplace and residence, contending that the probation officer did not have the right to perform any type of warrantless search and that the evidence seized at the residence was the result of the illegal search of the workplace. The motion was denied, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The probation officer's authority to conduct warrantless searches was extended by the waiver of privacy to which Roper agreed as a condition of probation. The officers were lawfully at Roper's workplace because they had authority to request a urinalysis and to search Roper's person, and the seizure of the black pouch was proper based on the plain view doctrine and information that the pouch was where Roper kept drugs. Further, because the evidence at the workplace was lawfully gathered, the District Court did not err when it denied the motion to suppress evidence gathered during the subsequent search of Roper's home. St. v. Roper, 2001 MT 96, 305 M 212, 26 P3d 741 (2001).

Entry of Intensive Supervision Program Officer Into Probationer's Home Without Consent Unlawful — Information Gathered Via Search Admissible as Independent Source or Inevitable Discovery Exceptions to Fruit of Poisonous Tree Doctrine: As a condition of suspended sentencing, Therriault was placed in the intensive supervision program (ISP). Near the end of the program, Therriault's supervising officer, McCarty, arrived at Therriault's residence for a routine check. Although Therriault was not there, McCarty entered the residence and found, in plain view, what he thought might be a note for him from Therriault, but which turned out to be a high school registration form for a female student. McCarty then went to Therriault's sister's home next door. Therriault's sister informed McCarty that she had seen a girl at Therriault's home during the prior 2 weeks and inquired about the lawful age of consent. McCarty then reentered Therriault's home and reviewed the form, discovering that the applicant was 14 years old. McCarty left a note for Therriault to contact him and left the residence but returned later that night to discover a 14-year-old girl in Therriault's basement. Upon petition to revoke his probation, Therriault alleged that the discovery directly resulted from an illegal search and seizure and moved to suppress all evidence under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. The District Court denied the motion, revoked Therriault's suspended sentence, and sentenced him to prison for the remainder of the term. Therriault appealed. The state contended that as a participant in ISP, Therriault enjoyed little or no expectation of privacy and that McCarty's conduct did not constitute a search. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that ISP is merely a rigid condition imposed on certain probationers and that it is the sentencing tribunal, not the ISP officer, that establishes the conditions for any search of the probationer's person or property and that any ISP rules, terms or conditions, or means of supervision that conflict with a court-ordered condition of probation will be superseded by the court's conditions. The state misconstrued Therriault's expectation of privacy under ISP because the court's probationary condition stated that Therriault would submit his residence "to search at any time by lawful authorities upon reasonable request of his Probation Officer", so Therriault could expect that an intrusion into the privacy of his home would not occur unless McCarty had reasonable cause and first posed a reasonable request. Accordingly, McCarty's conduct constituted an illegal search and evidence obtained through the unlawful conduct would not generally be admissible under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. However, under St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919 (1996), such derivative evidence is admissible if it is: (1) attenuated from the constitutional violation so as to remove its primary taint; (2) obtained from an independent source; or (3) determined to be evidence that would have been inevitably discovered apart from the constitutional violation. In this case, the second exception applied. McCarty received independent incriminating evidence from Therriault's sister; thus, it was not the tainted evidence of the girl's name or age or the fact that she was transferring to a different school that led to her discovery, but rather the independent information that a girl of questionable age had been residing with Therriault. This irrefutable evidence, ascertained through a source sufficiently independent of McCarty's unlawful conduct, warranted exclusion from the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. The District Court's revocation of Therriault's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Therriault, 2000 MT 286, 302 M 189, 14 P3d 444, 57 St. Rep. 1185 (2000).

New Sentence Restriction Added Upon Revocation of Suspended Sentence Stricken: If a District Court finds that a defendant has violated the terms or conditions of a suspended sentence, the court may revoke the suspended sentence and require the defendant to serve either the sentence imposed or any lesser sentence, but nothing in 46-18-203 authorizes a court to impose additional restrictions when revoking a suspended sentence. (See 2001 amendment to this section, which allows it.) In this case, the District Court originally sentenced Richardson to 20 years in prison for felony sexual assault against a child, with all but 70 days suspended, conditioned in part upon completion of a sex offender treatment program. Richardson failed treatment and admitted violating other conditions of the suspended sentence, so the sentence was revoked, and Richardson was sentenced to prison for the remainder of the 20-year sentence. Additionally, the court conditioned Richardson's parole eligibility upon successful completion of the first two phases of sexual offender treatment in prison. The additional restriction on the sentence was error, and the case was remanded for the limited purpose of striking that condition from the sentence. St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000), following St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

"Finding" in Probation Modification Order Not Res Judicata as to Issue of Compliance With Terms of Probation: Lindeman pleaded guilty to charges of sexual abuse and incest and, as a condition of probation, was required to complete a sex offender treatment program and to have no unsupervised contact with minors. After some efforts at treatment, for which the treatment provider issued a letter saying that Lindeman had "graduated" from the program, Lindeman petitioned the District Court for a modification of the previous order in order to allow him to have contact with his minor daughter. In issuing the order, the District Court found that Lindeman had completed the sex offender treatment program. However, Lindeman had not in fact completed a treatment program meeting the standards required in his original probation order, and the treatment provider was not qualified to treat Lindeman because the provider lacked credentials required by the original probation order. Later, when the state sought to revoke Lindeman's probation and impose the suspended sentence based upon Lindeman's failure to complete the treatment program, Lindeman argued that the issue of completion of the program was res judicata under the probation modification order of the District Court. Citing Hollister v. Forsythe, 277 M 23, 918 P2d 665 (1996), the Supreme Court held that the issue of Lindeman's completion of the treatment program was not res judicata because the issues in the probation modification proceeding and the later revocation proceeding were not the same. The Supreme Court pointed out that at the probation modification hearing: (1) the issue of completion of the treatment program was not before the District Court; (2) the hearing was requested by Lindeman to change a condition concerning contact with minors, not completion of the treatment program; (3) the District Court did not remove the condition that Lindeman complete the treatment program; and (4) the "finding" was unnecessary to the District Court's decision to modify the condition of probation. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988), and St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530 (1990), and noted that the only way that the issue of completion of the treatment program could have been determined by the District Court was through a petition filed pursuant to 46-18-203, which did not occur. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the "finding" by the District Court was not a conclusive, litigated finding and therefore was not res judicata as to whether Lindeman had completed treatment as required in his probation order. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

Parole Officer Duty of Care to Supervise Parolees — Jury Instruction Properly Given: Corliss was paroled, after serving time for an execution-style slaying with a handgun, under the condition that he not possess a firearm. While on a visit, with the approval of his parole officer, to Washington state to look for work, Corliss failed to return to Montana within the established time, failed to see a parole officer in Washington, had a temporary restraining order obtained against him by a girlfriend because of threats made to her and her family, and had an altercation with his wife involving a handgun. In neither instance of violence did Corliss's parole officer investigate the circumstances of the violence. Later, Corliss shot and killed one friend of his girlfriend and injured another. Both the estates of the deceased woman and the wounded woman brought actions against the state for negligent supervision of Corliss's parole. The state objected to an instruction given by the District Court concerning a parole officer's duty of care, claiming that there must be some special relationship between the parole officer and the person injured by a parolee in order for a duty of care to arise. The Supreme Court reviewed statutes defining negligence, statutes describing the general duty of one individual toward another, and statutes concerning parole and concluded that Robbins had a general duty to exercise reasonable care in the supervision of Corliss and had a duty to the killed and injured women in particular. Starkenburg v. St., 282 M.1, 934 P2d 1018, 54 St. Rep. 214 (1997). See also Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081, 56 St. Rep. 771 (1999).

Failure to Conduct Preliminary Onsite Hearing in Extradition Case — No Due Process Violation: In 1989, Hardy pleaded guilty to four counts of burglary and was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 10 years in prison with 9 years suspended. In 1990, Hardy was released on probation to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, and pursuant to the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision, supervision of his parole was transferred to Utah. While in Utah, Hardy committed other crimes, and Utah refused to continue parole supervision. Hardy pleaded no contest to the Utah offenses. After judgment and sentencing in Utah, Hardy was extradited back to Montana where his suspended sentence was revoked, he was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 9 years in prison, and he was not given credit for the 2 years he spent on probation in Utah. Hardy contended that there was a violation of his due process rights in not receiving a preliminary hearing upon his return to Montana, that his Montana probation officer wrongly informed him that his probation would not be revoked for misdemeanor convictions, and that he was improperly denied credit for his street time while on probation in Utah. In this case, a preliminary onsite hearing would have contributed nothing to a determination of whether Hardy had violated his probation. As evidenced by his no contest pleas and admissions, Hardy indisputably violated the conditions of his probation. A preliminary onsite hearing would not have led to any other finding. Failure to provide Hardy with a hearing did not prejudice his substantial rights. St. v. Hardy, 278 M 516, 926 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 998 (1996).

Representations of Parole Violations by Parole Officer Not Clearly Erroneous — Revocation Proceeding Not Estopped: In 1989, Hardy pleaded guilty to four counts of burglary and was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 10 years in prison with 9 years suspended. In 1990, Hardy was released on probation to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, and pursuant to the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision, supervision of his parole was transferred to Utah. While in Utah, Hardy committed other crimes, and Utah refused to continue parole supervision. Hardy pleaded no contest to the Utah offenses. After judgment and sentencing in Utah, Hardy was extradited back to Montana where his suspended sentence was revoked, he was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 9 years in prison, and he was not given credit for the 2 years he spent on probation in Utah. Hardy contended that his Montana probation officer wrongly informed him that his probation would not be revoked for misdemeanor convictions and that his probation should thus not have been revoked. The Supreme Court noted that Montana did not participate in plea negotiations between Hardy and the State of Utah and that Hardy knowingly, voluntarily, and with assistance of counsel entered into a no contest plea agreement. The representations to Hardy by his Montana parole officer were not clearly erroneous. The court's conclusion that Montana was not estopped from proceeding with revocation based on the parole officer's representations was correct. St. v. Hardy, 278 M 516, 926 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 998 (1996).

Five-Year Suspension Revoked for Failure to Enter Inpatient Alcohol Program: There was substantial evidence to support the revocation of probation and imposition of the original 5-year sentence since defendant failed to comply with a condition that required immediate entry into an inpatient alcohol counseling program. The probation officer fulfilled his duty to advise probationer of the conditions and consequences of a violation. The District Court revoked the suspension pursuant to the discretion granted in 46-18-203 in accordance with the minimum requirements for invoking such discretion. There was no abuse of discretion in the court's consideration of the factors in the original sentencing, except for the sentencing judge's determination that defendant was a dangerous offender. (See 1995 repeal of 46-18-404.) No findings appeared in support of such designation. St. v. Ford, 218 M 215, 707 P2d 16, 42 St. Rep. 1530 (1985).

46-23-1012. Arrest when violations of probation alleged — probation compliance plan — probation violator intervention.

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 493 in (1) substituted text regarding issuance of warrant or notice to appear for former text that read: "At any time during probation or suspension of sentence, a court may issue a warrant for the arrest of the defendant for violation of any of the conditions of release or a notice to appear to answer to a charge of violation. The notice must be personally served upon the defendant. The warrant must authorize all officers named in the warrant to return the defendant to the custody of the court or to any suitable detention facility designated by the court"; in (2) throughout subsection substituted reference to probationer for reference to defendant, in first sentence near beginning after "warrant or may" inserted "orally", near middle after "12 hours delivering to the" substituted "detention center" for "place of detention", and at end after "violated the conditions of" substituted "probation" for "the defendant's release", and in second sentence near middle after "the official in charge of a" substituted "detention center" for "county detention center or other place of detention"; and substituted (3) through (5) regarding detention of probationer and revocation of probation for former (3) through (5) that read: "(3) Provisions regarding release on bail of a person charged with a crime are applicable to the defendants arrested under these provisions.

(4) Any probation and parole officer may hold a defendant arrested under subsection (1) without bail for 72 hours. After the arrest of the defendant pursuant to this subsection, a hearings officer for the probation and parole bureau shall hold a hearing within 36 hours of the defendant's arrest. The hearings officer shall determine whether there is probable cause to believe that the defendant has violated a condition of probation and, if probable cause exists, notify the sentencing court and determine an appropriate plan to ensure the defendant's compliance with the conditions of probation. An appropriate plan may include:

(a) holding the defendant for a period of time up to 30 days, with credit for any time served from the time of the arrest to the time of the hearing to determine probable cause;

(b) a request to the court pursuant to 46-23-1011 to modify the defendant's terms or conditions of probation; or

(c) a notification to the court with jurisdiction over the defendant pursuant to 46-23-1013.

(5) The department shall adopt policies and procedures to implement a probation violator prison diversion program. If the department is able to sufficiently sanction a defendant with a term in a detention center as provided in subsection (4)(a) for a proven technical violation that could result in the revocation of a suspended or deferred sentence, the department may pay the expense of the detention center costs and pursue payment of costs by the defendant as provided in 7-32-2245. If the action plan developed for the defendant proceeds as provided in subsection (4)(b) or (4)(c), the expenses of the detention must be paid as provided in 7-32-2242." Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 493, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who are under the custody or supervision of the department of corrections on [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 505 in first sentence in (2) after "giving" inserted "the officer oral authorization and within 12 hours delivering to the place of detention" and in second sentence after "statement" inserted "or oral authorization", after "county" substituted "detention center" for "jail", and after "defendant" inserted "if the probation and parole officer delivers the written statement within 12 hours of the defendant's arrest"; inserted (4) authorizing probation and parole officer to hold arrested defendant without bail for 72 hours, providing for hearing, notification, and determination of appropriate plan, and outlining contents of appropriate plan; inserted (5) requiring department to adopt policies and procedures for probation violation prison diversion program and authorizing payment of detention center expenses; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1999.

Case Notes

Unnecessary Delay — Seventeen Days Between Arrest and Initial Appearance — Case Dismissed Without Prejudice: The defendant, a probationer, was arrested and placed in custody after allegedly striking a cyclist with his car. The defendant spent 17 days in custody between the time of his initial arrest for violating probation and his initial appearance after being charged with aggravated assault. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss the aggravated assault charge, arguing that his initial appearance was unnecessarily delayed in violation of both 46-7-101 and his constitutional right of due process. The District Court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss, but it suppressed statements made by the defendant while in custody due to the delay. The defendant ultimately pleaded no contest to the charge of aggravated assault but reserved the right to appeal the denial of his motion to dismiss for delay of his initial appearance. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment and sentence, holding that the defendant's initial appearance had been unnecessarily delayed. The Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court with instructions to dismiss the charge of aggravated assault without prejudice. St. v. Norvell, 2019 MT 105, 395 Mont. 404, 440 P.3d 634.

No Impermissible Double Sanction for Initiation of Revocation Proceeding After a 72-Hour Hold and Release — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim Denied: A probationer who was detained and released following a suspected probation violation was not denied effective assistance of counsel even though defense counsel did not argue that 46-23-1012(3) prohibits initiation of a revocation proceeding following a 72-hour hold and release. The probation officer chose to release the probationer from jail, subsequently filed a revocation proceeding pursuant to 46-23-1012(5), and did not pursue an intervention hearing in addition to a revocation hearing. St. v. Maynard, 2010 MT 115, 356 Mont. 333, 233 P.3d 331.

Revocation of Parole or Probation Not Considered Punishment for Double Jeopardy Purposes: Revocation is a supervisory act involving the enforcement of conditions imposed on a term of parole or probation. Therefore, the same act or acts may form the basis for revoking both an offender's parole and an ensuing suspended sentence without contravening double jeopardy protections. Here, Haagenson was granted conditional release and a suspended sentence subject to certain conditions, including a requirement that he remain law abiding and not consume alcohol. Haagenson subsequently violated these conditions and thus forfeited both the conditional release and the future suspended sentence. St. v. Haagenson, 2010 MT 95, 356 Mont. 177, 232 P.3d 367, distinguishing St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 Mont. 394, 188 P.3d 1034, and St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 Mont. 93, 193 P.3d 925.

Arrest Limited to One Initiated Pursuant to Statutory Procedures: The Supreme Court construed the meaning of the term "arrest" as used in subsection (4) of this section to refer to one of two specific types of arrests a probation officer initiates pursuant to subsection (2): (1) a probation officer may ask the court to issue a warrant; or (2) the probation officer may arrest the probationer or may authorize a peace officer to arrest the probationer. Thus, in this case the state correctly followed statutory procedures when it filed a report of probation violations within 10 days of the probation officer's issuance of a warrant to arrest and hold the defendant. St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P.3d 925 (2008), overruled in part in St. v. Maynard, 2010 MT 115, 356 Mont. 333, 233 P.3d 331. See also St. v. Evans, 2012 MT 115, 365 Mont. 163, 280 P.3d 871.

Due Process in Probation Revocation Process Considered Constitutionally Adequate: The following procedures in 46-23-1012 provide adequate due process to an alleged probation violator: (1) the probation officer must file a report of violation within 10 days of the probationer's arrest; (2) the state must bring the probationer before a judge for a hearing on the charges without unnecessary delay after the report of violation is filed; and (3) the state must notify the probationer at the hearing of the alleged probation violations. St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P.3d 925 (2008), overruled in part in St. v. Maynard, 2010 MT 115, 356 Mont. 333, 233 P.3d 331. See also St. v. Swan, 220 M 162, 713 P.2d 1003 (1986), and St. v. Evans, 2012 MT 115, 365 Mont. 163, 280 P.3d 871.

District Court Authority to Revoke Suspended Sentence for Parole Violation for Which Defendant Not Sanctioned or Punished: Martinez was given a 7-year suspended sentence for felony criminal endangerment, subject to 25 conditions, including a requirement that Martinez notify the probation officer upon a change of residence. Following numerous probation violations, three separate intervention hearings were held to address the violations. One of the probation officers subsequently recommended that Martinez be brought before the District Court for revocation of the suspended sentence. The District Court heard testimony from two probation officers regarding the repeated violations and revoked Martinez's suspended sentence. Martinez appealed on grounds that the probation officer lacked the statutory authority to seek sentence revocation for conduct addressed by the revocation hearings and contended that the revocation violated double jeopardy because it amounted to double punishment for violations addressed by the revocation hearings. The Supreme Court agreed that once a probation officer elects to pursue an intervention hearing under 46-23-1012(3), the officer cannot then also pursue a revocation hearing before the District Court for the same violation. However, Martinez's violation of the requirement to notify the probation officer upon a change of residence occurred after the third intervention hearing, and Martinez was not sanctioned or punished for that violation. That violation in itself was sufficient to support revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence, and even if the District Court considered the history of Martinez's violations in reaching its decision, the court did not abuse its discretion or exceed its statutory authority in revoking the sentence based on that violation alone. Additionally, no double jeopardy violation occurred when the sentence was revoked based on a violation for which Martinez was not previously sanctioned or punished. Thus, revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 M 394, 188 P.3d 1034 (2008).

Untimely Hearing on Alleged Probation Violation — Not Considered in Postconviction Relief Proceeding When It Could Have Been Raised on Direct Appeal: Appellant's claim that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to revoke a suspended sentence following his arrest for another offense because he was not given a probation revocation hearing within 72 hours of his detention, as required by this section, did not raise a true jurisdictional question. The claim was more properly characterized as a claim that his sentence was illegal, which was a nonjurisdictional claim for purposes of postconviction relief statutes. Section 46-21-105 precludes postconviction relief on such a claim because appellant could have raised the claim on direct appeal. Sanders v. St., 2004 MT 374, 325 M 59, 103 P3d 1053 (2004).

Waiver of Constitutional Issues Related to No-Bond Hold by Failure to Object in Trial Court: Hendricks contended that his constitutional right to due process and the right against excessive bail were violated when he was held without bond for more than 72 hours in violation of this section. However, there was no factual record to support the allegations, nor did Hendricks object to the asserted constitutional violations at a revocation hearing or move to dismiss the proceedings. Failure to adequately raise the issue in District Court and to create a factual record constituted a waiver of objection and precluded review of the issue on appeal. Further, Hendricks' assertion of error in the District Court's reliance on hearsay testimony at the revocation hearing failed on the same grounds. St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 163, 316 M 296, 71 P3d 1212 (2003), following St. v. Azure, 2002 MT 22, 308 M 201, 41 P3d 899 (2002).

Dual Statutory Revocation Proceedings — Formal Revocation Proceedings Not Subject to Time and Procedural Requirements of Probation Violator Prison Diversion Program: This section authorizes two distinct methods of commencing revocation. One method is the formal proceeding outlined in 46-18-203 and subsection (1) of this section. The other method is an abbreviated proceeding initiated by detention by the probation and parole office, known as the probation violator prison diversion program, set forth in subsections (3) through (5) of this section, and the abbreviated proceeding may be converted to a formal revocation pursuant to subsection (5) of this section. The time and procedural requirements of the probation violator prison diversion program, as provided in subsections (3) through (5) of this section, do not apply to the formal proceeding initiated pursuant to 46-18-203 and subsection (1) of this section, which requires that an offender be brought before the court without unnecessary delay. Gonzales v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 259, 307 M 228, 37 P3d 653 (2001), followed in St. v. Finley, 2003 MT 239, 317 M 268, 77 P3d 193 (2003).

No Entitlement to Probable Cause Hearing Upon Revocation of Parole Rather Than Probation — Goebel Clarified: Gundrum was arrested for a parole violation, and his parole was revoked. Gundrum contended that he was illegally restrained because he was not afforded a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of his arrest as provided in this section and discussed in St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), and St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001). Gundrum cited the language in Goebel that this section applies to individuals whose "probation or parole" was revoked between April 28, 1999, and May 1, 2001. The Supreme Court held that the Goebel decision, as it related to parole revocation, was in error. Although this section applies to probation revocation, a separate statute, 46-23-1023, applies to parole revocation. There is no strict time period for a probable cause hearing related to a parole violation; rather, 46-23-1024 simply requires that a hearing be held within a reasonable time. Further, Goebel and Giddings both dealt with probation violations, and the Supreme Court declined to apply the same hearing requirements to parole violations. Gundrum's incarceration was legal. Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001).

No Power of State to Refile Petition to Revoke Suspended or Deferred Sentence Once Original Sentence Expires: Vance claimed that because a probable cause hearing was not held within 36 hours of arrest under a bench warrant for probation revocation, the provisions of St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001), should apply and the revocation proceedings should be rendered void. The state agreed that Giddings applied, but indicated that a petition for revocation of deferred sentence would be refiled pursuant to this section. Vance pointed out that the original deferred sentence had expired, and argued that the refile of a petition for revocation of an expired sentence was prohibited under 46-18-203. The state contended that the reasoning in St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), implied that the original sentence was tolled during the period of the void proceedings for purposes of refile of a petition to revoke. The Supreme Court agreed with Vance. The fact that the previous revocation proceedings were defective and therefore void ab initio did not mean that time stood still during the defective proceedings, nor do Giddings and Goebel suspend the provisions of 46-18-203, which clearly state that the petition for revocation must be filed with the sentencing court during the period of suspension or deferral. Nothing in law allows the state to refile a revocation petition to relate back to the date of the probation violation, and once the term of the sentence expires, the state has no more power to refile to revoke the suspended or deferred sentence than it would have to file an original proceeding to revoke under those circumstances. Vance v. Acton, 2001 MT 243, 307 M 71, 36 P3d 881 (2001).

Retroactivity of New Judicial Rules and Judicial Interpretation — This Section (1999) Applied Retroactively to Parole Revocations Between April 28, 1999, and May 1, 2001: On April 26, 2001, the Supreme Court held that a probable cause hearing was mandatory only when an offender had been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. On May 4, 2001, Goebel petitioned the court to look beyond the plain language of this section and hold that the probable cause hearing was mandatory only when an offender has been arrested by a probation officer rather than pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Effective May 1, 2001, the Legislature amended this section to delete the requirement for a probable cause hearing. On May 9, 2001, Giddings filed a petition for rehearing, asking the court to direct the District Court to dismiss the petition to revoke Giddings' suspended sentence on grounds that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to revoke the suspended sentence because of the amendment to this section, contending that application of the new statute would violate the constitutional ban on ex post facto legislation. The Supreme Court declined to modify the decision in either Goebel or Giddings because no material fact or question decisive of the cases themselves was overlooked and the decisions did not conflict with any express statute or controlling decision. However, the court did discuss the retroactive application of judicial rules of criminal procedure and the judicial interpretation of a statute, as well as the claim that the retroactive application of this section was a violation of the ex post facto clause. Citing Rivers v. Roadway Express, 511 US 298 (1994), the court held that a court's interpretation of a statute is never new law because the decision declares what the statute meant from the day of its enactment, not from the date of the decision. In determining whether a statute violates the ex post facto clause, the court referred to the test in St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453 (2000), which provided that to be in violation of the clause, a statute must be retrospective and must disadvantage the offender affected by it. In this case, Giddings was not disadvantaged because the statutory change did not alter the definition of or punishment for the probation violation that Giddings was charged with. Further, the error that was the basis for reversal of Giddings' case was jurisdictional, so all proceedings in the District Court were void ab initio, and the state was entitled to proceed anew, following the procedure outlined in the newly amended version of this section. The Supreme Court's decisions based on the 1999 version of this section were applicable retroactively to persons whose probation or parole was revoked between April 28, 1999, and May 1, 2001. Thus, if a person was arrested during that period pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge and was not afforded a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of arrest, then the District Court did not have jurisdiction to hold a revocation hearing, so the state could refile the petition to revoke the person's probation pursuant to the 2001 version of this section, as long as the probationer was still under the custody or supervision of the Department of Corrections on May 1, 2001. If the person was afforded a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of arrest, then the District Court did have jurisdiction to hold a revocation hearing. St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 155, 306 M 83, 31 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Finley, 2003 MT 239, 317 M 268, 77 P3d 193 (2003), and St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Erroneous Dismissal of Petition to Revoke Sentence Based on Failure to Hold Timely Hearing: Under this section, there are two ways that an offender can come into custody for allegations of a probation violation. The first is when a judge issues a warrant for the offender's arrest, and the second is when the offender is arrested by a probation or parole officer or when a probation or parole officer authorizes a law enforcement officer to make the arrest. In this case, Goebel was arrested by a probation and parole officer. Prior to the 2001 amendments, the second sentence of subsection (4) of this section read: "After the arrest of the defendant pursuant to this subsection, a hearings officer for the probation and parole bureau shall hold a hearing within 36 hours of the defendant's arrest" (emphasis added). Goebel contended before the District Court that the petition to revoke his suspended sentence should be dismissed because the state did not hold a hearing within 36 hours of his arrest. The court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the state argued that the 1999 amendments to subsection (4) of this section mandated a hearing only in the case of violators who are arrested pursuant to a warrant and that the Legislature left to the discretion of the Probation and Parole Bureau the decision of whether to hold a hearing for every other violator, while Goebel maintained that the phrase "pursuant to this subsection" required the Bureau to hold a hearing in every case of alleged parole violation before proceeding under 46-23-1013 (now repealed). The Supreme Court found the statutory language in subsection (4) to be clear and unambiguous and contrary to the assertions of both parties. Because a defendant may be arrested only under the provisions of subsections (1) and (2), the phrase "after the arrest of the defendant pursuant to this subsection" could not refer to the entirety of this section, as Goebel contended, nor could it refer only to subsection (4), as the state contended. Rather, the court held that “this subsection” related back to the reference in the previous sentence to subsection (1), which allows a judge to issue a warrant or notice to appear, so a probable cause hearing by the Probation and Parole Bureau is mandatory only when an offender has been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Because Goebel was not arrested pursuant to a warrant, the 36-hour rule did not apply. Despite the fact that the Supreme Court found the statute clear and unambiguous, it pointed out that this interpretation rendered the statute illogical because probable cause must be shown before a warrant is issued. It makes little sense to require a second probable cause hearing, while common sense would dictate that there should be a reasonably prompt probable cause hearing when an arrest is made without a warrant. Rather than examine the legislative history to discern the Legislature’s intent in using the particular language, the court ascribed the confusion to a legislative drafting error and left correction of the language to the Legislature. St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), clarified in Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001), in which it was held that the 36-hour requirement for a probable cause hearing applies only to probation revocation proceedings under this section and not to parole revocation proceedings under 46-23-1023, and followed in St. v. Johnson, 2001 MT 277, 307 M 317, 37 P3d 701 (2001).

Probable Cause Hearing Required When Offender Arrested Pursuant to Warrant — Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction When Timely Hearing Not Held: Giddings was arrested August 1 on a probation violation warrant issued by his probation officer. The next day while he was still detained, the District Court issued a warrant for his arrest based on the earlier petition to revoke his suspended sentence. A hearing on the petition was held on November 10, Giddings’ suspended sentence was subsequently revoked, and he was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 4 years. Giddings argued on appeal that pursuant to this section as it read prior to the 2001 amendments, the Probation and Parole Bureau was required to hold a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of his arrest and that because no such hearing was held, the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to hold a revocation hearing 3 months later regarding the technical violations of probation alleged in the probation violation report. The state contended that a probable cause hearing is required only when the probationer is dealt with administratively through the probation violator prison diversion program described in subsection (4) of this section as it read prior to the 2001 amendments and that an administrative probable cause hearing is not required when a probationer is arrested on a bench warrant and is processed through the judicial system. The Supreme Court reversed, applying St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), in holding that a hearing by the Probation and Parole Bureau under subsection (4) of this section as it read prior to the 2001 amendments is mandatory within 36 hours when an offender has been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Because the probable cause hearing was never held, the District Court lacked jurisdiction to hold its revocation hearing later. St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001), clarified in Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001), in which it was held that the 36-hour requirement for a probable cause hearing applies only to probation revocation proceedings under this section and not to parole revocation proceedings under 46-23-1023.

Arrest Without Written Authority — Suppression of Evidence: An arrest by a Montana law enforcement officer for violation of the terms of probation must be in accordance with this section. The police officer arrested the probationer in violation of this section when the arrest was for a probation violation and the police officer did not have written authority to arrest from the probation officer. Assuming that probation violation is a criminal offense and that the police officer had probable cause to arrest for violation of probation, the arrest was not proper under 46-6-311 because existing circumstances did not require an immediate arrest. The gun seized in defendant’s bedroom after the arrest was suppressed as evidence in the federal prosecution for violation of 18 U.S.C. 922(g)(1), which prohibits possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. U.S. v. Shepard, 21 F3d 933 (9th Cir. 1994).

Failure to Appear for Probation Officer-Ordered Urine Sample — Minimal Grounds Required to Order Testing: It was error for the District Court to dismiss a petition for revocation of suspended sentence based on the defendant’s failure to appear for purposes of providing a urine sample because the probation officer did not have some articulable reasons for requesting the test. Under the standard established in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), the Supreme Court held that a probation officer’s opinion that rehabilitation could not begin until the defendant was free of drugs and the fact that the defendant had not passed a drug test since his arrest constituted sufficient evidence to establish reasonable grounds for requiring a urine sample. St. v. Sigler, 236 M 137, 769 P2d 703, 46 St. Rep. 244 (1989).

Admission of Parole Violation — Hospital Detention Not Unlawful: Defendant was admitted to the hospital the day after he confessed to a parole violation. While in the hospital, he was informed that he was not free to leave and would be arrested upon release. Defendant's admission of a parole violation constituted probable cause to detain him, and the hospital detention was not unlawful. Because defendant had already been convicted and was on probation, any presumption of innocence was gone. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Probation Violator Subject to Provisions Regarding Release on Bail: A person who has been convicted, sentenced, and placed on probation and who has violated probation is subject to the provisions regarding release on bail. The provisions of 46-20-204, providing for a stay of execution and relief pending appeal of original conviction, do not apply. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

No Preliminary or Probable Cause Hearing — Due Process: Defendant was not denied due process for the state's failure to provide an appearance denominated as a preliminary or probable cause hearing prior to a probation revocation hearing. After a defendant is arrested for violation of probation, he is brought before the court without unnecessary delay for a hearing on the violations charged. No two-stage hearing process is necessary under this statutory system because the reasons for having a preliminary hearing are absent. The revocation hearing is held promptly, before a defendant is returned to prison. The defendant receives notice of the hearing and alleged violations, and the hearing is held before a judge, rather than an administrative body. Section 46-23-1013 (now repealed) sets forth the procedure to follow after the arrest of a probationer for violation of probation. Because the scheme affords due process, the statute is not an unconstitutional violation of due process. St. v. Swan, 220 M 162, 713 P2d 1003, 43 St. Rep. 259 (1986). See also St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Preliminary Hearing Not Required to Establish Probable Cause: Where probation was revoked by original sentencing judge, petitioner was not denied minimum standards of due process as petitioner was not arrested until a bench warrant was issued pursuant to the final order of revocation after a hearing at which petitioner was represented at every step by counsel. Where no detention is involved, a preliminary hearing to establish probable cause for filing a petition for imposition of final judgment and sentence is not necessary as no rights of the probationer have been violated. In re Meidinger, 168 M 7, 539 P2d 1185 (1975). See also St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Parole Violation: This section does not require parolee to be taken before court for complete hearing on parole violation but provides only for persons on probation or on suspended sentence. Petition of Spurlock, 153 M 475, 458 P2d 80 (1969).

Subsequent Arrest for Violation: When petitioner was placed on probation for 1 year on conditions aimed at rehabilitating him, subsequent imposition of judgment after he violated his probation did not put him in jeopardy in violation of the federal or Montana Constitution. In re Williams' Petition, 145 M 45, 399 P2d 732 (1965).

Commencement of Sentence: When relator was sentenced to 4 years' confinement and the execution of the sentence was then suspended, which suspension was later revoked, the sentence commenced to run for all purposes on the date when judgment of conviction was entered. Any time between the imposition of the suspended sentence and its revocation should have been credited to the relator and failure to do so resulted in his illegal confinement. State ex rel. Wetzel v. Ellsworth, 143 M 54, 387 P2d 442 (1963).

2017 Amendment — Coordination: Chapter 391 in (1) inserted "shall consult the incentives and interventions grid adopted under 53-1-203 to determine an appropriate response and"; in (3) substituted current text for former text that read: "If the hearings officer determines by a preponderance of the evidence that the probationer has violated a condition of probation, the hearings officer may order the probationer to serve up to 30 days in a county detention center, with credit for time served since the time of arrest, or order the probationer to participate in a day reporting program as provided for in 53-1-203 and order the probationer to pay the costs of incarceration or participation in the day reporting program. The department shall pay the incarceration costs not paid by the probationer"; inserted (4) concerning notification of probationer; in (5) inserted "or other facility"; inserted (6) concerning documentation of sanction and placement decisions in offender's file; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 19, 2017.

Case Notes

No Impermissible Double Sanction for Initiation of Revocation Proceeding After a 72-Hour Hold and Release — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim Denied: A probationer who was detained and released following a suspected probation violation was not denied effective assistance of counsel even though defense counsel did not argue that 46-23-1012(3) prohibits initiation of a revocation proceeding following a 72-hour hold and release. The probation officer chose to release the probationer from jail, subsequently filed a revocation proceeding pursuant to 46-23-1012(5), and did not pursue an intervention hearing in addition to a revocation hearing. St. v. Maynard, 2010 MT 115, 356 Mont. 333, 233 P.3d 331.

Breach of Intervention Agreement — Issue Preclusion Applicable: McDaniel was sentenced to 20 years for burglary, with the sentence suspended subject to several conditions. About 4 months after sentencing, McDaniel tested positive for drugs, and the probation officer elected to initiate an intervention hearing, where an agreement was entered into in lieu of a formal violation being filed. Upon learning of the intervention hearing, the County Attorney filed a petition to revoke McDaniel's suspended sentence based on McDaniel's drug use. McDaniel moved for partial summary judgment on grounds that the intervention hearing agreement constituted a final adjudication of the probation violation and a binding contract and that the state was barred from relitigating the issue. The District Court denied the motion, McDaniel appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. McDaniel and the state, acting through the Department of Corrections, entered a valid binding contract that precluded filing of a formal violation, and the state breached the contract by filing the revocation petition. Additionally, the elements of issue preclusion were satisfied with respect to the state's liability on the breach of contract claim, including the state's opportunity to argue liability, so absent any genuine issue of material fact, McDaniel was entitled to partial summary judgment on the breach of contract claim. McDaniel v. St., 2009 MT 159, 350 M 422, 208 P3d 817 (2009), following Baltrusch v. Baltrusch, 2006 MT 51, 331 M 281, 130 P3d 1267 (2006).

No State Prosecutorial Immunity for Actions of County Attorney: McDaniel was sentenced to 20 years for burglary, with the sentence suspended subject to several conditions. About 4 months after sentencing, McDaniel tested positive for drugs, and the probation officer elected to initiate an intervention hearing, where an agreement was entered into in lieu of a formal violation being filed. Upon learning of the intervention hearing, the County Attorney filed a petition to revoke McDaniel's suspended sentence based on McDaniel's drug use. McDaniel moved to dismiss on grounds that in filing the revocation petition, the state breached the agreement. The District Court granted McDaniel's motions, and the revocation petition was dismissed. McDaniel subsequently filed an action against the state for damages, claiming that the state breached the written agreement and deprived McDaniel of property in violation of due process. The state asserted that because the County Attorney was acting within the scope of his duties as an agent of the state when filing the revocation petition, the state was entitled to prosecutorial immunity. The District Court agreed and granted the state's motion for summary judgment. On appeal, the state contended that prosecutorial immunity should be extended to include county and state governments employing prosecutors who are named as defendants in tort actions. However, for the state to extend the County Attorney's immunity to itself, the state must establish that the County Attorney could raise prosecutorial immunity as a defense if the claims were brought against the County Attorney rather than the state. Here, the County Attorney was not a party to the intervention agreement, so there was no factual or legal basis for McDaniel to bring a contract-based claim against the County Attorney, and absent a basis for the prosecutor to assert prosecutorial immunity, there was no basis for the state to extend immunity to itself. The Legislature intended to waive state immunity as to express contracts, so it was incongruous for the state to assert immunity as a defense to the alleged contract violation. The Supreme Court reversed. McDaniel v. St., 2009 MT 159, 350 M 422, 208 P3d 817 (2009).

District Court Authority to Revoke Suspended Sentence for Parole Violation for Which Defendant Not Sanctioned or Punished: Martinez was given a 7-year suspended sentence for felony criminal endangerment, subject to 25 conditions, including a requirement that Martinez notify the probation officer upon a change of residence. Following numerous probation violations, three separate intervention hearings were held to address the violations. One of the probation officers subsequently recommended that Martinez be brought before the District Court for revocation of the suspended sentence. The District Court heard testimony from two probation officers regarding the repeated violations and revoked Martinez's suspended sentence. Martinez appealed on grounds that the probation officer lacked the statutory authority to seek sentence revocation for conduct addressed by the revocation hearings and contended that the revocation violated double jeopardy because it amounted to double punishment for violations addressed by the revocation hearings. The Supreme Court agreed that once a probation officer elects to pursue an intervention hearing under 46-23-1012(3), the officer cannot then also pursue a revocation hearing before the District Court for the same violation. However, Martinez's violation of the requirement to notify the probation officer upon a change of residence occurred after the third intervention hearing, and Martinez was not sanctioned or punished for that violation. That violation in itself was sufficient to support revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence, and even if the District Court considered the history of Martinez's violations in reaching its decision, the court did not abuse its discretion or exceed its statutory authority in revoking the sentence based on that violation alone. Additionally, no double jeopardy violation occurred when the sentence was revoked based on a violation for which Martinez was not previously sanctioned or punished. Thus, revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 M 394, 188 P3d 1034 (2008).

ARM 20.7.1101 Conditions on probation or parole.

Case Notes

Parole Officer Duty of Care to Supervise Parolees — Jury Instruction Properly Given: Corliss was paroled, after serving time for an execution-style slaying with a handgun, under the condition that he not possess a firearm. While on a visit, with the approval of his parole officer, to Washington state to look for work, Corliss failed to return to Montana within the established time, failed to see a parole officer in Washington, had a temporary restraining order obtained against him by a girlfriend because of threats made to her and her family, and had an altercation with his wife involving a handgun. In neither instance of violence did Corliss’s parole officer investigate the circumstances of the violence. Later, Corliss shot and killed one friend of his girlfriend and injured another. Both the estates of the deceased woman and the wounded woman brought actions against the state for negligent supervision of Corliss’s parole. The state objected to an instruction given by the District Court concerning a parole officer’s duty of care, claiming that there must be some special relationship between the parole officer and the person injured by a parolee in order for a duty of care to arise. The Supreme Court reviewed statutes defining negligence, statutes describing the general duty of one individual toward another, and statutes concerning parole and concluded that Robbins had a general duty to exercise reasonable care in the supervision of Corliss and had a duty to the killed and injured women in particular. Starkenburger v. St., 282 M 1, 934 P2d 1018, 54 St. Rep. 214 (1997). See also Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081, 56 St. Rep. 771 (1999).

Erroneous Parole Revocation: Given the issue of whether a parolee who, after a full revocation hearing, had been found by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) not to have violated his parole could nevertheless be confined pending submission of an acceptable new parole plan, the Supreme Court held that the parolee must be released within 30 days from the decision and that the Board was under a duty to develop and approve a parole plan within that period. Lopez v. Crist, 176 M 352, 578 P2d 312 (1978).

No Entitlement to Probable Cause Hearing Upon Revocation of Parole Rather Than Probation — Goebel Clarified: Gundrum was arrested for a parole violation, and his parole was revoked. Gundrum contended that he was illegally restrained because he was not afforded a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of his arrest as provided in 46-23-1012 and discussed in St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), and St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001). Gundrum cited the language in Goebel that 46-23-1012 applies to individuals whose “probation or parole” was revoked between April 28, 1999, and May 1, 2001. The Supreme Court held that the Goebel decision, as it related to parole revocation, was in error. Although 46-23-1012 applies to probation revocation, this section applies to parole revocation. There is no strict time period for a probable cause hearing related to a parole violation; rather, 46-23-1024 simply requires that a hearing be held within a reasonable time. Further, Goebel and Giddings both dealt with probation violations, and the Supreme Court declined to apply the same hearing requirements to parole violations. Gundrum’s incarceration was legal. Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001).

ARM 20.2.201 Contested cases — general authority.

Case Notes

“No Contact” Agreement Construed: A probation agreement stated: “You will have no contact with the victim of this offense or her family.” Defendant claimed that because the victim made contact with him, rather than vice versa, he did not violate probation. Defendant misconstrued the agreement, and his contacts with the victim constituted a probation violation. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Parole Violation — Evidence Not Within Scope of Appeal Properly Excluded: Defendant convicted of parole violation contended that tape recordings, which might have shown distress and suicidal tendencies, were useful in his development of a defense of “duress” and “necessity”. However, admission of the evidence was properly denied because it was cumulative and irrelevant to the issue of parole violation and revocation of his suspended sentence. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Revocation of Suspended Portion of Sentence — No Due Process Violation: Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault and sexual intercourse without consent and was sentenced to a term of 40 years in the Montana State Prison. The sentence review board modified the sentence to 40 years with 20 years suspended provided that the defendant successfully complete a sex treatment program. Upon defendant’s failure to complete the program, the District Court, following four hearings, ordered the original 40-year sentence to be reinstated. Defendant appealed, alleging due process violations for failure to follow parole and probation revocation procedures. The Supreme Court, in affirming the revocation, ruled that the right to a speedy trial, while guaranteed in criminal prosecutions, is not applicable in revocation of probation proceedings and that no preliminary hearing is required before a revocation proceeding when detention is not involved. St. v. Friedman, 225 M 373, 732 P2d 1322, 44 St. Rep. 313 (1987). See also St. v. Stangeland, 233 M 230, 758 P2d 776, 45 St. Rep. 1446 (1988).

Revocation of Parole Without Preliminary On-Site Hearing or Counsel at Final Hearing: The Supreme Court held that a preliminary on-site hearing was not necessary in this situation. The purpose of an on-site hearing is to “determine whether there is probable cause or reasonable ground to believe that the arrested parolee has committed acts that would constitute a violation of parole conditions. Cf. Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 US 267”. In this case, defendant’s presence in another state clearly established probable cause that defendant had violated his parole. Not only was he not supposed to be outside of Montana, he was not supposed to be away from Galen State Hospital. He would have had no mitigating circumstances of misunderstanding to voice at an on-site hearing. At a final parole revocation hearing defendant had no constitutional right to counsel. Owens v. Risley, 217 M 35, 702 P2d 1, 42 St. Rep. 1000 (1985).

Admissibility of Suppressed Evidence: Evidence of drugs seized in a search conducted under a defective warrant, although not admissible in prosecution for possession of the drugs, was properly considered in hearing on revocation of parole. St. v. Thorsness, 165 M 321, 528 P2d 692 (1974).

Appointment of Counsel Not Required: Under this section, a parole violator is required to be brought before board for hearing, but court hearing is not required; the parole violator does not have constitutional right but has statutory right to an attorney at parole revocation hearing, and board is not required to furnish parolee an attorney during such hearing. Petition of Wing, 154 M 501, 464 P2d 302 (1969).

Promptness of Hearing: When 5-month delay by parole board (now Board of Pardons and Parole) was seemingly caused by parolee being in hospital, requirement under this section that hearing be “prompt” was not violated. Petition of Spurlock, 153 M 475, 458 P2d 80 (1969).

46-23-1025. Report to and action by board.

Compiler’s Comments

2017 Amendment: Chapter 392 in (1) in first sentence inserted “and directs the probation and parole officer to initiate a petition for revocation”, after “conditions of release” inserted “and describe the exhaustion of appropriate violation responses according to the department’s incentives and interventions grid”, and at end inserted “and placed in the offender’s file”; in (2) and (3) substituted current text for former (2) that read: “(2) Upon receipt of a report, the board shall cause the prisoner to be promptly brought before a hearing panel for a hearing on the violation charged under rules that the board may adopt. If the violation is established, the hearing panel may continue or revoke the parole or may enter an order as it sees fit”; inserted (7) concerning documentation required in the offender’s file; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2017.

Applicability: Section 23, Ch. 392, L. 2017, provided: “[This act] applies to hearings conducted under Title 46, chapter 23, parts 2 or 3, and parole supervision and revocation hearings conducted under Title 46, chapter 23, part 10, on or after [the effective date of this section].” Effective July 1, 2017.

2011 Amendment: Chapter 102 in (3) substituted “supervising parole officer” for “board”, substituted “46-23-1024” for “subsection (2)”, and substituted “to provide written or oral comment” for “to be heard”; in (5) at end substituted language regarding the amount of time a prisoner served for “whether the time from the issuing of the warrant to the date of the prisoner’s return to the custody of Montana law enforcement, the department, or the department’s agent or any part of the time will be counted as time served under the sentence”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2011.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 17, Ch. 102, L. 2011, provided: “[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to applications made to the board on or before [the effective date of this act] and that are pending decision on [the effective date of this act].” Effective July 1, 2011.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 559 throughout section substituted “hearing panel” for references to board; in (2) in second sentence after “parole” deleted “or conditional release”; in (4) near beginning substituted “the hearing panel determines” for “it appears” and after “prisoner’s” substituted “return to the custody of Montana law enforcement, the department, or the department’s agent” for “arrest”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 13, Ch. 559, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 14, Ch. 559, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 125 inserted (3) relating to violation of condition of release requiring payment of restitution; and made minor changes in style.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

ARM 20.2.201 Contested cases — general authority.

Title 20, chapter 25, subchapter 8, ARM Revocation of parole.

Case Notes

Revocation of Parole or Probation Not Considered Punishment for Double Jeopardy Purposes: Revocation is a supervisory act involving the enforcement of conditions imposed on a term of parole or probation. Therefore, the same act or acts may form the basis for revoking both an offender’s parole and an ensuing suspended sentence without contravening double jeopardy protections. Here, Haagenson was granted conditional release and a suspended sentence subject to certain conditions, including a requirement that he remain law abiding and not consume alcohol. Haagenson subsequently violated these conditions and thus forfeited both the conditional release and the future suspended sentence. St. v. Haagenson, 2010 MT 95, 356 Mont. 177, 232 P.3d 367, distinguishing St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 Mont. 394, 188 P.3d 1034, and St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 Mont. 93, 193 P.3d 925.

No Standing to Raise Constitutionality of Restitution Statutes Absent Showing of Direct Personal Injury: The 2003 Legislature amended the state restitution statutes, and Thaut sought to challenge the constitutionality of the amendments on numerous grounds. However, Thaut was unable to show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the restitution laws. Pursuant to St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990), and Helena Parents Comm’n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm’rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140 (1996), Thaut lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the restitution statutes, and the Supreme Court declined to address the issue. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004). See also St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), in which defendant established direct economic injury and thus standing to challenge the constitutionality of repayment conditions on equal protection grounds through the District Court’s order to repay $2,398 in costs of appointed counsel.

Revocation of Parole Without Preliminary On-Site Hearing or Counsel at Final Hearing: The Supreme Court held that a preliminary on-site hearing was not necessary in this situation. The purpose of an on-site hearing is to “determine whether there is probable cause or reasonable ground to believe that the arrested parolee has committed acts that would constitute a violation of parole conditions. Cf. Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 US 267”. In this case, defendant’s presence in another state clearly established probable cause that defendant had violated his parole. Not only was he not supposed to be outside of Montana, he was not supposed to be away from Galen State Hospital. He would have had no mitigating circumstances of misunderstanding to voice at an on-site hearing. At a final parole revocation hearing defendant had no constitutional right to counsel. Owens v. Risley, 217 M 35, 702 P2d 1, 42 St. Rep. 1000 (1985).

Admissibility of Suppressed Evidence: Evidence of drugs seized in a search conducted under a defective warrant, although not admissible in prosecution for possession of the drugs, was properly considered in hearing on revocation of parole. St. v. Thorsness, 165 M 321, 528 P2d 692 (1974).

Appointment of Counsel Not Required: Under this section, a parole violator is required to be brought before board for hearing, but court hearing is not required; the parole violator does not have constitutional right but has statutory right to an attorney at parole revocation hearing, and board is not required to furnish parolee an attorney during such hearing. Petition of Wing, 154 M 501, 464 P2d 302 (1969).

Promptness of Hearing: When 5-month delay by parole board (now Board of Pardons and Parole) was seemingly caused by parolee being in hospital, requirement under this section that hearing be "prompt" was not violated. Petition of Spurlock, 153 M 475, 458 P2d 80 (1969).

Attorney General's Opinions

Use of Less Than Full Board for Parole Revocation Hearings: The Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) may conduct parole revocation hearings using a single member designated by the board chairman if the full board makes that examiner's decision final, and the single member's decision may be appealed by the offender at a new hearing before the full board. 37 A.G. Op. 23 (1977).

2009 Amendment: Chapter 66 in (1)(a)(i) at beginning deleted "under intensive supervision or conditional release". Amendment effective March 25, 2009.

2005 Amendments — Composite Section — Coordination: Section 6, Ch. 360, L. 2005, a coordination section, provided that if House Bill No. 288 is passed and approved and if it amends 46-23-1031, then [section 3 of this act], amending 46-23-1031, is void and 46-23-1031 must be amended as follows: in (1)(a)(i) after "pay to the" substituted "department" for "clerk of the district court that has jurisdiction over the person during the person's supervision"; inserted (1)(a)(ii) requiring payment of a supervisory fee by a person under continuous satellite-based monitoring; in (1)(c) near middle after "subsection (1)(a)" inserted "or (1)(b)"; in (2)(b) at beginning substituted "The department" for "Prior to July 1, 2003, district court clerks shall deduct from the total supervisory fees collected pursuant to subsection (1) the administrative cost of collecting and accounting for the fees and shall deposit the remaining amount into the state special revenue account established in subsection (2)(a). After June 30, 2003, district court clerks" and at end after "subsection (2)(a)" deleted "as specified by the supreme court administrator"; and made minor changes in style. House Bill No. 288 was approved as Ch. 473, L. 2005. Section 3, Ch. 473, L. 2005, amended sec. 8, Ch. 360, L. 2005, to provide that this amendment is effective October 1, 2005.

Chapter 473 in (1)(a)(i) after "shall pay to" substituted "the department" for "the clerk of the district court that has jurisdiction over the person during the person's supervision"; and in (2)(b) deleted former first sentence that read: "Prior to July 1, 2003, district court clerks shall deduct from the total supervisory fees collected pursuant to subsection (1) the administrative cost of collecting and accounting for the fees and shall deposit the remaining amount into the state special revenue account established in subsection (2)(a)" and at beginning substituted "The department" for "After June 30, 2003, district court clerks" and at end deleted "as specified by the supreme court administrator". Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 360, L. 2005, provided: "WHEREAS, the United States Department of Justice has published confirmed statistics that over 60% of serious and violent offenders in state prisons have a history of prior convictions and that the number of prisoners convicted for violent sexual assault has increased by an annual rate of 15% each year since 1980; and

WHEREAS, criminals who commit sexual and violent crimes have shown unusually high recidivism rates, thereby posing an unacceptable level of risk to the community; and

WHEREAS, intensive supervision of sexual or violent offenders is a crucial element to both the rehabilitation of the released convicts and the safety of the surrounding community; and

WHEREAS, mature technological solutions now exist to provide improved supervision and behavioral control of sexual or violent offenders following their release; and

WHEREAS, these solutions can now also provide law enforcement and correctional professionals with significant new tools for electronic correlation of the constantly updated geographical location of supervised sexual or violent offenders following their release with the geographic location of reported crimes, both to possibly link released offenders to crimes or to possibly exclude released offenders from ongoing criminal investigations; and

WHEREAS, continuous 24-hour-a-day, 7-day-a-week electronic monitoring of those convicted of sexual offenses is a valuable and reasonable requirement for those convicts who are placed on probation, who failed to register as sexual or violent offenders as required by law, or who have been released from incarceration while they remain under the active supervision of the state."

Severability: Section 7, Ch. 360, L. 2005, was a severability clause.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 386 in (1)(a) near beginning of first sentence after "parolee" inserted "or person committed to the department who is supervised by the department under intensive supervision or conditional release" and after "pay" inserted "to the clerk of the district court that has jurisdiction over the person during the person's supervision", inserted second sentence providing for a $50 transfer processing fee, and at beginning of third sentence after "The" substituted "interstate transfer fees required by this subsection" for "fee" and at end after "collected by the" substituted "department" for "clerk of the district court with jurisdiction during the probationer's or parolee's period of supervision under this part"; in (1)(b) at beginning after "court" inserted "department", after "fee" inserted "required by subsection (1)(a)", near middle after "payment of the" inserted "supervisory", and near end after "cause the" substituted "person" for "probationer or parolee"; in (2)(b) near beginning of first sentence after "total" inserted "supervisory" and in second sentence after "deposit the" substituted "total supervisory fees collected pursuant to subsection (1)" for "fees"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 17, 2003.

2002 Amendment: Chapter 13 in (2)(b)(i) at beginning inserted "Prior to July 1, 2003"; inserted (2)(b)(ii) relating to deposit as specified by the supreme court administrator; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective August 16, 2002.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 505 in (1)(a) after "fee" substituted "of no less than $120 a year and no more than $360 a year" for "of $120 a year" and after "prorated at" inserted "no less than". Amendment effective April 28, 1999.

Effective Date: Section 4, Ch. 577, L. 1993, provided that this section is effective July 1, 1993.

Case Notes

Order on Fees Reversed — District Court Misapprehended Effect of Evidence When Conducting Ability-to-Pay Analysis — Undisputed Evidence That Defendant Could Not Pay — Unreasonable to Impose Discretionary Fees. St. v. Dowd, 2023 MT 170, 413 Mont. 245, 535 P.3d 645.

No Error in Allowing Parole Officer to Set Restitution Schedule — Refusal to Waive Administrative Fees Proper: Denham contended that it was error for the sentencing court to delegate the scheduling of monthly restitution payments to a parole officer because the version of 46-18-244 in effect at the time of the crime did not provide for that delegation of authority. The Supreme Court held that the amendments to the statute were purely procedural and did not constitute retroactive legislation, impair Denham's rights, or impose additional duties on Denham, so allowing the parole officer to set the restitution schedule was not error. Denham also appealed the $60,099 restitution and the 10% administrative fee and minimal surcharges. However, Denham assured the court at sentencing of his ability to pay the restitution amount, so it was reasonable to assume that he also had the ability to pay the administrative fee and surcharges. The sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Denham, 2005 MT 26, 326 M 24, 107 P3d 1263 (2005).

Extra Conditions in Sentencing Order Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Stricken: The District Court that sentenced Waters imposed two extra conditions in the sentencing order that were not contained in the plea agreement or presentence investigation or contained in the oral sentence: (1) payment of supervision fees; and (2) submission to Texas authorities. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls. Thus, Waters contended that only the conditions contained in the oral sentence could be imposed. The Supreme Court clarified Lane, noting that Waters was on notice of the conditions in the plea agreement and presentence investigation and that those terms applied despite the ambiguous sentencing conditions that were imposed orally. However, the court remanded for an amendment of the written sentence to strike the submission to Texas authorities, which was never mentioned, and to strike the payment of supervision fees as well, unless it was determined that payment of the fees would not impose a significant hardship on Waters, pursuant to this section. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Parolee and Probationer Supervision Fee Not Violative of Ex Post Facto Restriction: Frazier asserted that because he was sentenced prior to the enactment of this section, the supervisory fee assessed in that section against parolees and probationers could not be retroactively applied to him or other parolees and probationers similarly situated. For a criminal or penal statute to be ex post facto, it must: (1) be retrospective, applying to events occurring before its enactment; and (2) disadvantage the affected offender. A civil sanction will implicate ex post facto concerns only if it can be fairly characterized as punishment. The legislative history of this section indicated that the supervisory fee was assessed to help defray the costs of supervision and to hold parolees and probationers accountable, rather than to punish. Because the fee is administrative rather than punitive, it does not violate the prohibition against ex post facto laws. Frazier v. Dept. of Corrections, 277 M 82, 920 P2d 93, 53 St. Rep. 551 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Leistiko, 256 M 32, 844 P2d 97 (1992).

Case NotesDECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW

Governmental Entity Liable for Tortious Acts of Contractor Transporting Prisoners: Paull was a prisoner who was injured in an auto accident while being extradited to Park County by a private prisoner transportation service. The District Court summarily dismissed Paull's tort claim against the state and county for his injuries after the state and county argued that they owed Paull no actionable duty because the injuries were inflicted by the transportation company or its employees and that Paull's injuries were not foreseeable. The court concluded that the state owed Paull no duty because the state had no contractual or agency relationship with the company and that the county had no duty because a contractor-independent contractor relationship existed between the county and the company. Paull appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The court first addressed the county's liability, considering whether the county had a contractor-independent contractor relationship with the company. Under Beckman v. Butte-Silver Bow County, 2000 MT 112, 299 M 389, 1 P3d 348 (2000), an exception to the general rule that contractors are not liable for torts of their independent contractors applies if the activity is inherently or intrinsically dangerous. The District Court found that the activity in question was driving, which commonly is not an inherently dangerous activity, so the Beckman exception did not apply. The Supreme Court disagreed. Transportation of prisoners is more than just driving and is an inherently dangerous activity; therefore, under Beckman, a county or other governmental entity that contracts to have prisoners transported by an independent contractor may be held vicariously liable for injuries caused by the contractor. Any claim must still be established under the ordinary rules of negligence, requiring proof of the existence of a legal duty on the part of the contractor, breach of duty, causation, and damages. A contractor is not liable for every tort by an independent contractor engaged in inherently dangerous work, but only those torts that arise from risks caused by engaging in the dangerous activity. Here, the risk of driver misconduct was an inherent danger in the transportation of prisoners and part of the peculiar risk of harm arising from that activity. Likewise, the state had a duty to exercise ordinary care in returning Paull to Montana for probation revocation proceedings. Although the state was not strictly liable for any injury during prisoner transportation regardless of fault, the state may be held liable for tortious acts or omissions of its agents undertaking prisoner transportation if the state allows other entities to do the work. Because the acts or omissions of the transportation company for which the state or county might be liable were yet to be determined, summary judgment was inappropriate, and the case was remanded for further proceedings. Paull v. Park County, 2009 MT 321, 352 M 465, 218 P3d 1198 (2009). However, see Stricker v. Blaine County, 2019 MT 280, 398 Mont. 43, 453 P.3d 897, holding that a county could not be held vicariously liable for a hospital's negligent treatment of an inmate in its custody.

Failure to Conduct Preliminary Onsite Hearing in Extradition Case — No Due Process Violation: In 1989, Hardy pleaded guilty to four counts of burglary and was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 10 years in prison with 9 years suspended. In 1990, Hardy was released on probation to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, and pursuant to the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision (now repealed and replaced with 46-23-1115), supervision of his parole was transferred to Utah. While in Utah, Hardy committed other crimes, and Utah refused to continue parole supervision. Hardy pleaded no contest to the Utah offenses. After judgment and sentencing in Utah, Hardy was extradited back to Montana where his suspended sentence was revoked, he was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 9 years in prison, and he was not given credit for the 2 years he spent on probation in Utah. Hardy contended that there was a violation of his due process rights in not receiving a preliminary hearing upon his return to Montana, that his Montana probation officer wrongly informed him that his probation would not be revoked for misdemeanor convictions, and that he was improperly denied credit for his street time while on probation in Utah. In this case, a preliminary onsite hearing would have contributed nothing to a determination of whether Hardy had violated his probation. As evidenced by his no contest pleas and admissions, Hardy indisputably violated the conditions of his probation. A preliminary onsite hearing would not have led to any other finding. Failure to provide Hardy with a hearing did not prejudice his substantial rights. St. v. Hardy, 278 M 516, 926 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 998 (1996).

Representations of Parole Violations by Parole Officer Not Clearly Erroneous — Revocation Proceeding Not Estopped: In 1989, Hardy pleaded guilty to four counts of burglary and was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 10 years in prison with 9 years suspended. In 1990, Hardy was released on probation to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, and pursuant to the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision (now repealed and replaced with 46-23-1115), supervision of his parole was transferred to Utah. While in Utah, Hardy committed other crimes, and Utah refused to continue parole supervision. Hardy pleaded no contest to the Utah offenses. After judgment and sentencing in Utah, Hardy was extradited back to Montana where his suspended sentence was revoked, he was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 9 years in prison, and he was not given credit for the 2 years he spent on probation in Utah. Hardy contended that his Montana probation officer wrongly informed him that his probation would not be revoked for misdemeanor convictions and that his probation should thus not have been revoked. The Supreme Court noted that Montana did not participate in plea negotiations between Hardy and the State of Utah and that Hardy knowingly, voluntarily, and with assistance of counsel entered into a no contest plea agreement. The representations to Hardy by his Montana parole officer were not clearly erroneous. The court's conclusion that Montana was not estopped from proceeding with revocation based on the parole officer's representations was correct. St. v. Hardy, 278 M 516, 926 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 998 (1996).

Interstate Probation — Retaking Violator — Hearing Not Always Required: Montana probationer who had been transferred to Idaho was arrested for assault and then transferred back to Montana, where his probation was revoked after a hearing. He petitioned the Supreme Court for a Writ of Habeas Corpus on the grounds that he had been denied due process because he was not given a preliminary hearing in Idaho. The Supreme Court held that he had not been denied due process and that he was not entitled to a preliminary onsite hearing because he did not have a liberty interest at the time of the revocation proceedings since he was under lawful arrest in Idaho at the time. St. v. Howell, 222 M 136, 720 P2d 1174, 43 St. Rep. 1119 (1986).

Insufficient Evidence — Remand for Evidentiary Hearing: While working in North Dakota on the recommendation of his Montana probation officer, defendant whose Montana sentence had been suspended pleaded guilty to North Dakota charges of driving under the influence, no driver's license, and escape from lawful custody. He was returned to Montana and his suspended sentence was revoked. On appeal, the Supreme Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing because: (1) it was not clear from the record whether his right to due process was violated; (2) there may have been a plea bargain consented to by Montana in which North Dakota stated there would be no recommendation of probation violation if defendant pleaded guilty; and (3) there was insufficient evidence, in view of unresolved fact issues, to support the revocation. St. v. Monteith, 216 M 413, 701 P2d 993, 42 St. Rep. 911 (1985).

Revocation of Parole: When an individual's parole revocation failed to meet the statutory requirements of 46-23-1101 through 46-23-1106 (all now repealed and replaced with 46-23-1115) and the requirements of Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 US 471, 33 L Ed 2d 484, 92 S Ct 2593 (1972), the individual's parole must be reinstated. Fisher v. Crist, 182 M 124, 594 P2d 1140 (1979).

Waiver of Hearing: The failure to demand an onsite hearing cannot be construed to be a waiver of that right. Fisher v. Crist, 182 M 124, 594 P2d 1140 (1979).

Constitutionality: Requirement that parolee sign waiver of extradition before release to another state was not unconstitutional, and parolee could be detained for parole violation by unauthorized departure from the host state. In re Petition of Schwartz, 154 M 505, 463 P2d 316 (1970), certiorari denied, 398 US 913, 26 L Ed 2d 75, 90 S Ct 1713 (1970).

Return of Parolee Without Extradition: Parolee's rights under United States Constitution were not violated when parolee was returned to state from Oregon for parole violations without resort to extradition and, even if constitutional right was involved, it was waived by parolee's agreement with state wherein, as condition of parole, he waived certain rights. In re Petition of Dixon, 149 M 412, 430 P2d 642 (1967).

CHAPTER 24 TREATMENT OF VICTIMS AND WITNESSES

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Preamble: The preamble to Ch. 554, L. 1985, which enacted this chapter, provided:

"WHEREAS, without the cooperation of victims and witnesses, the criminal justice system would cease to function; yet with some exceptions, these individuals are either ignored by the criminal justice system or simply used as a means to identify and punish offenders; and

WHEREAS, all too often the victim of a serious crime is forced to suffer physical, psychological, or financial hardship, first as a result of the criminal act, and then as a result of contact with a criminal justice system unresponsive to the real needs of such victim; and

WHEREAS, while the defendant is provided with counsel who can explain both the criminal justice process and the rights of the defendant, the victim or witness has no counterpart and is usually not even notified when the defendant is released on bail, the case is dismissed, a plea to a lesser charge is accepted, or a court date is changed; and

WHEREAS, the victim and witness who cooperate with the prosecutor often find that they must share the pretrial waiting room with the defendant or his family and friends; and

WHEREAS, the victim may lose valuable property to a criminal only to lose it again for long periods of time to law enforcement officials until the trial, and sometimes until all appeals are over; and many times the property is damaged or lost, which is particularly stressful for the elderly or the poor; and

WHEREAS, the majority of serious crimes fall under the jurisdiction of state and local law enforcement agencies.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to provide for the fair and proper treatment of crime victims and witnesses in the criminal justice system."

Case Notes

No Common-Law Duty of County to Notify Tenant of Release of Detainee: Leanne Miller obtained a protective order prohibiting her husband, Tommy, from contacting Leanne, her property, or her children. When Tommy was arrested following multiple violations of the restraining order, Leanne requested that the Gallatin County detention center notify her upon Tommy's release. However, the center did not contact Leanne when Tommy was released. Tommy then went to Leanne's rental home, killed her, and set fire to the home. The landlord filed a negligence action against the county for damages to the property resulting from the county's failure to notify Leanne, asserting that the county had a common-law duty to the landlord. The District Court granted summary judgment to the county, and the landlord appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The complaint was couched in terms of the county's duty to Leanne, but cited no independent common-law duty extending to the landlord. Without a prevailing common-law theory, the cause of action derived solely from 46-24-203 and this section, regardless of whether those sections were cited or not. Therefore, under 46-24-105, the landlord was precluded from recovering against the county based on the failure to notify Leanne of Tommy's release, and summary judgment was proper. Bos v. Gallatin County, 2003 MT 162, 316 M 292, 71 P3d 1209 (2003).

46-24-106. Crime victims — family members — right to attend proceedings — exceptions — right to receive documents — rights during interview.Compiler's Comments 2007 Amendment: Chapter 424 inserted (6) providing that a criminal offense victim has a right to a copy of all public documents filed with the court with exceptions, providing that if the victim is under 18, copies must be provided to the victim's parent or guardian, and listing exceptions; and inserted (7) providing that a victim has the right to a victim advocate's presence during interviewing when requested. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 33 in definition of victim in (5)(a) after "injury" inserted "or reasonable apprehension of bodily injury"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 18, 2005.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 33, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to crimes committed before [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 18, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 3, Ch. 104, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

Effective Date: Section 4, Ch. 104, L. 2001, provided that this section is effective on passage and approval. Approved March 22, 2001.

Case Notes

Motion to Exclude Victim From Trial Properly Denied: The state filed a notice that the victim of an alleged crime who would testify at trial planned to be present in the courtroom throughout the trial. The defendant, who had been charged with attempted homicide, moved to exclude the victim under Rule 615, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), which the District Court denied. After his conviction, the defendant appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed the denial of the motion to exclude, concluding that the defendant, as the moving party, had the burden to prove that the exclusion was warranted. The defendant's conclusory statements without specific facts were insufficient to warrant exclusion given the victim's statutory right to be present at the trial. St. v. Braulick, 2015 MT 147, 379 Mont. 302, 349 P.3d 508.

CHAPTER 30 UNIFORM CRIMINAL EXTRADITION ACT

Chapter Case Notes

Applicability to Juveniles: Since juveniles were not intentionally omitted from the provisions of Title 46, ch. 30, commonly known as the "Uniform Criminal Extradition Act", and because there is no additional procedural protection for juveniles under the Act, a Governor's warrant that fulfilled the applicability considerations outlined in In re Petition of Blackburn, 215 M 440, 701 P2d 715, 42 St. Rep. 525 (1985), was properly applied to extradition of a juvenile, since juveniles are not to be treated any differently than adults by the asylum state. Coble v. Magone, 229 M 45, 744 P2d 1244, 44 St. Rep. 1766 (1987).

Extradition for Criminal Nonsupport: Although a child support order issued by another state is a civil and not a criminal action, failure to pay the support may be a crime (felony criminal nonsupport) in that state and the defendant is subject to extradition for criminal proceedings. Crabtree v. St., 186 M 340, 607 P2d 566 (1980).

Chapter Attorney General's Opinions

No Entitlement to Bail After Waiver of Extradition — State Jurisdiction Only to Effect Transport: There is no provision for bail either after an arrest on a Governor's extradition warrant or upon waiver of extradition, so a fugitive prisoner, after waiver of extradition, is not entitled to bail. Once extradition is waived, Montana District Courts retain jurisdiction only to effect transport of the fugitive to another state. 50 A.G. Op. 7 (2004).

Nondelinquent Youth Charged With Crime in Another State: Because Montana has not adopted Art. XVIII of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles, which provides that the Compact applies to juveniles charged with being delinquent by reason of violation of any criminal law, a youth who has not run away, escaped, or been adjudged delinquent is outside the scope of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles in Montana. A juvenile residing in Montana, and charged with a crime in another state, may be extradited under the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, Title 46, ch. 30. The soundest policy is to extradite any juvenile charged with a crime in another state, regardless of whether a juvenile court or an adult court has final jurisdiction. 41 A.G. Op. 24 (1985).

46-30-203. Extradition of persons who left demanding state involuntarily.

Uniform Commission Comments

The reason for this section lies in the fact that there is a conflict in the decisions upon the question whether a person who has been removed from a state under the compulsion of the authority of that state can be classed as a "fugitive" from that state so that his return can be secured through extradition proceedings. See, In re Whittington, 34 Cal. App. 344, 167 P 404; Hart v. Mangum, 146 Ga. 497, 91 S.W. 543; People ex rel. Hutchings v. Mallon, 245 N.Y. 521, 157 N.E. 842; *State ex rel. Shapiro v. 46-30-211. Demand — form.Uniform Commission Comments

This section was based in part upon Act of Congress of 1793, and decisions in Davis case, 122 Mass. 324, and Pearce v. Texas, 155 U.S. 387; cf. Scott on Interstate Rendition, section 91. As to the effect to be attributed to the papers accompanying the demand, see Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. 66, 104-109. The recognition of informations in states which allow them is probably supported by Hogan v. O'Neill, 255 U.S. 52. As to what the papers must show, see Hyatt v. People ex rel. Corkran, 188 U.S. 691; Innes v. Tobin, 240 U.S. 127; Scott, Interstate Rendition, section 96. On the violation of parole, see Hughes v. Pflanz, 138 Fed. 980.

Case Notes

Burden of Proof of Identity Upon Issuance of Warrant: Once the Governor of Montana has issued a warrant for the arrest and extradition of an accused, a presumption arises that the accused is the demanded fugitive. The burden of proof then shifts to the accused to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he is not the fugitive charged in the demanding state. Upon failure of the accused to produce the evidence, the District Court may properly deny a writ of habeas corpus. In re Henrichs, 237 M 59, 771 P2d 967, 46 St. Rep. 620 (1989).

Misspelling of Petitioner's Name — Extradition Proceedings Not Defective: Slight misspelling of petitioner's name on a criminal complaint and arrest warrant, where "Henrichs" was spelled "Hendricks", constituted a technical defect and did not render extradition proceedings defective in light of the fact that the description accompanying the warrant correctly described the petitioner. Under the doctrine of idem sonans, two names spelled differently are regarded as the same if they sound alike in their pronunciation. In re Henrichs, 237 M 59, 771 P2d 967, 46 St. Rep. 620 (1989).

Adequacy of Demand for Extradition — Technical Pleading Rules Inapplicable: Papers demanding extradition need not meet the technical rules of pleading. The court should consider whether they satisfactorily show that the person has been charged with a crime, no matter how inartfully they may be drawn. In re Petition of Blackburn, 215 M 440, 701 P2d 715, 42 St. Rep. 525 (1985).

Scope of Inquiry on Challenge to Extradition: The scope of inquiry by a court in an extradition proceeding is limited to whether: (1) the extradition documents on their face are in order; (2) the petitioner has been charged with a crime in the demanding state; (3) the petitioner is the person named in the request for extradition; and (4) the petitioner is a fugitive. Petitioner's claim that the transaction at issue in the state seeking his extradition from Montana constitutes a civil matter goes to the underlying charge and is thus beyond the scope of inquiry, though he could pursue that claim in the requesting state. In re Petition of Blackburn, 215 M 440, 701 P2d 715, 42 St. Rep. 525 (1985).

Uniform Commission Comments

The present law of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Delaware and Minnesota allows merely an “opportunity” to the accused to demand an investigation. New York and some other states prescribe definite time. For a uniform act, an indefinite time to be made certain by a judge before whom the accused shall be brought, would seem the plan most likely to satisfy all the states. This is the law in Oklahoma.

GENERALLY

Application for Writ of Habeas Corpus in Asylum State: Defendant was extradited to this state from another state and sentenced to prison. The remedy for a fugitive arrested in another state who opposes extradition is to apply for a writ of habeas corpus in the asylum state. Defendant, who did not oppose extradition in the asylum state before his return to this state, may not now attempt to do so in Montana. St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989), followed in Walker v. McCormick, 260 M 301, 858 P2d 373, 50 St. Rep. 1053 (1993).

Burden of Proof of Identity Upon Issuance of Warrant: Once the Governor of Montana has issued a warrant for the arrest and extradition of an accused, a presumption arises that the accused is the demanded fugitive. The burden of proof then shifts to the accused to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he is not the fugitive charged in the demanding state. Upon failure of the accused to produce the evidence, the District Court may properly deny a writ of habeas corpus. In re Henrichs, 237 M 59, 771 P2d 967, 46 St. Rep. 620 (1989).

Misspelling of Petitioner's Name — Extradition Proceedings Not Defective: Slight misspelling of petitioner's name on a criminal complaint and arrest warrant, where “Henrichs” was spelled “Hendricks”, constituted a technical defect and did not render extradition proceedings defective in light of the fact that the description accompanying the warrant correctly described the petitioner. Scope of and Necessity for Investigation: Section 46-30-212 does not require that the accused be given notice of an investigation, nor does it require an investigation of the demand for extradition. It simply gives the Governor the discretion to check the demanding papers. The legal rule for a century or more has been that the executive of the asylum state may act upon the requisition papers in the absence of the accused and without notice to him. The Governor's investigative authority and the scope of his discretion is limited to determining that the person demanded is charged with a crime and is a fugitive from justice and to the adequacy of the demand. The accused is entitled to a hearing with the aid of counsel before a judge of a court of record on the above issues, but there is no right of the accused to have an investigation by or a hearing or other appearance before the Governor. In re Petition of Blackburn, 215 M 440, 701 P2d 715, 42 St. Rep. 525 (1985).

Scope of Inquiry on Challenge to Extradition: The scope of inquiry by a court in an extradition proceeding is limited to whether: (1) the extradition documents on their face are in order; (2) the petitioner has been charged with a crime in the demanding state; (3) the petitioner is the person named in the request for extradition; and (4) the petitioner is a fugitive. Petitioner's claim that the transaction at issue in the state seeking his extradition from Montana constitutes a civil matter goes to the underlying charge and is thus beyond the scope of inquiry, though he could pursue that claim in the requesting state. In re Petition of Blackburn, 215 M 440, 701 P2d 715, 42 St. Rep. 525 (1985).

DISMISSAL

No Court Authority to Quash Writ of Extradition — Governor's Warrant Effective Despite Expiration of Federal Statutory Time Limit: Defendant contended that 18 U.S.C. 3182 gave the District Court authority to dismiss his case when he was not picked up by out-of-state authorities within 30 days after he was served with a Governor's warrant. Under the federal statute, the court could discharge him, if he was detained, or release him from bail, but the 30-day provision did not allow dismissal of the case or grant the court authority to quash the writ of extradition. The Supreme Court found the 30-day limit to be discretionary, not mandatory. Under 46-30-302 and 46-30-304, the governor's warrant was legally effective even though the 30-day limit had expired. St. v. Campbell, 233 M 502, 761 P2d 393, 45 St. Rep 1678 (1988).

Authority to Dismiss: A judge had no authority under 46-13-101 to grant defendant's motion to dismiss based on a defense which went to the general issue to be determined at trial or under 46-13-201 (renumbered 46-13-401) because he did not set forth the reasons for dismissal in an order entered on the minutes. St. v. Cole, 174 M 380, 571 P2d 87 (1977).

Dismissal on Application of Prosecutor: Where defendant did not move to dismiss or demur to second information which was filed after defendant had pleaded to first information, and thus was improperly filed under this section as it read at that time, but rather entered plea to second information and moved to dismiss first information, and where defendant entered no objection to second information at subsequent trial and did not question the information on appeal, defendant waived any right he may have had to object to second information as improper amendment to first information. Gransberry v. St., 149 M 158, 423 P2d 853 (1967).

"In Furtherance of Justice": Since the Legislature did not define the phrase "in furtherance of justice" as used in predecessor to this section, it is left for the court's judicial discretion, exercised in view of a defendant's constitutional rights and the interests of society, to determine what particular grounds warrant dismissal of a pending criminal action, and mandamus will not issue to control the court's discretion. State ex rel. Anderson v. Gile, 119 M 182, 172 P2d 583 (1946).

Operation and Effect: After dismissal of an indictment because of substantial defects therein, the District Court may, but is not required to, submit the case to another grand jury, or permit or order the County Attorney to file an information charging the defendant with the same offense ineffectually sought to be charged against him by the indictment. St. v. Vinn, 50 M 27, 144 P 773 (1914).

SPEEDY TRIAL

Factors to Consider: There are four factors to be considered in determining whether the right to a speedy trial is violated: (1) length of delay; (2) reason for delay; (3) defendant's assertion of the right; and (4) prejudice to the defendant. Length of delay is a triggering mechanism, and a delay of 317 days is sufficient to trigger an inquiry into the other factors. A delay due to the operation of the system is chargeable to the state. An accused must take some affirmative action to obtain a trial to be entitled to a discharge for delay. This burden is satisfied by making an appropriate motion. The incarceration of the defendant for the period of the delay demonstrates prejudice against him. St. v. Puzio & Allen, 182 M 163, 595 P2d 1163 (1979).

Good Cause for Delay: Although the defendant was not brought to trial until 8 months after entry of plea, there was good cause for the delay because defendant made four motions which had to be fully considered and there were several substitutions of presiding judges, often at the defendant's request. Also, under these circumstances it could not be said that the defendant's trial was not postponed upon his application. St. v. Nelson, 178 M 280, 583 P2d 435 (1978).

Not Proper Issue in Asylum State: The issue of lack of speedy trial is not properly cognizable by a court of the asylum state in a habeas corpus proceeding in that court contesting extradition to another state. In re Hart, 178 M 235, 583 P2d 411 (1978).

Delay Attributable to Defendant: Although the defendant was not brought to trial within 6 months after the filing of the information as required under former law, the defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial because trial had originally been set for a date within the 6-month period and was removed from the trial calendar only when the defendant sought supervisory control on an original procedure filed in the Supreme Court, even though the cause was not set for trial until 2 months after the Supreme Court had denied defendant's petition for supervisory control and returned the matter to the trial court. St. v. Lagerquist, 152 M 21, 445 P2d 910 (1968).

Delay Attributable to Prosecutor: Under former statute providing that court shall dismiss charges against a defendant who is not brought to trial within 6 months after the filing of the information unless the trial has been postponed upon application of defendant, defendant was entitled to dismissal, even though defendant had demurred to the information and had not entered a plea, since County Attorney had failed to call up the demurrers for a hearing as he was entitled to do before the 6-month period had expired. State ex rel. Sullivan v. District Court, 150 M 203, 433 P2d 146 (1967).

Criminal Nonsupport — Examination of Merits: In extradition proceedings for criminal nonsupport, the District Court erred in considering the merits of out-of-state charges against defendant. Only procedural matters as set forth in Mich. v. Doran, 439 US 282, 58 L Ed 2d 521, 99 S Ct 530 (1978), are permissible under Art. IV, sec. 2, U.S. Const. *Crabtree v. Presence in Demanding State: This section does not prevent inquiry in habeas corpus proceedings brought by the accused as to whether the accused was in the demanding state at the time of the offense, and the accused should have been allowed to introduce evidence that he was not. *State ex rel. Part 3

Procedure for Arresting Accused Without Warrant

Part Attorney General's Opinions

No Entitlement to Bail After Waiver of Extradition — State Jurisdiction Only to Effect Transport: There is no provision for bail either after an arrest on a Governor's extradition warrant or upon waiver of extradition, so a fugitive prisoner, after waiver of extradition, is not entitled to bail. Once extradition is waived, Montana District Courts retain jurisdiction only to effect transport of the fugitive to another state. 50 A.G. Op. 7 (2004).

46-30-301. Arrest of accused without warrant.

Uniform Commission Comments

See 11 Ruling Case Law, p. 720: "The arrest may be made either by virtue of a warrant from a magistrate or by an officer or private person, who may justify the arrest by showing that prima facie a felony or other crime has been committed by the prisoner in another state, or that he stands charged therewith." To the same effect see Scott on Interstate Rendition, p. 161. An arrest without warrant was sustained in the following cases where the accused stood charged with a felony punishable by imprisonment for more than one year. Simmons v. Van Dyke, 138 Ind. 380 (forgery); In re Henry, 29 How. Pr. (N.Y.) 185 (robbery); Dow's case, 18 Pa. 37 (forgery); State v. Taylor, 70 Vt. 1 (burglary).

The preliminary draft of this Section provided for arrest without warrant in all cases where the accused stood charged with a "felony" in the demanding state. Because of the belief that "felony" did not have a uniform meaning, the Conference substituted the expression "charged with a crime punishable by death or life imprisonment". The Conference has become convinced that the enactment of this substituted language would result in restricting too severely the machinery for the enforcement of the criminal law, and would in many instances change the present practice of arresting without a warrant persons who have committed felonies punishable by imprisonment for more than one year but less than for life. To avoid this restrictive effect, the Conference in 1932 revised the section to provide for arrest without a warrant where the accused stands charged "with a crime punishable by death or imprisonment for a term exceeding one year". This is an adoption of the usual definition of "felony".

Applicability of Time Limits: The time limits in 46-30-302 and 46-30-304 refer only to the length of detention permitted before an accused person must be released from custody in the asylum state. These sections do not require dismissal of extradition proceedings for any supposed time limits on issuance of the Governor's warrant. These sections have no applicability once a Governor's warrant has been issued. Once the Governor of Montana issues his warrant, all questions involving the prior arrest and detention are rendered immaterial. In re Petition of Blackburn, 215 M 440, 701 P2d 715, 42 St. Rep. 525 (1985), followed in *St. v. Arrest Warrant Not Sufficient to Trigger Interstate Act: An arrest warrant, unless based upon an untried indictment, information, or complaint, is insufficient to trigger the Interstate Agreement on Detainers. Blakey v. District Court, 232 M 178, 755 P2d 1380, 45 St. Rep. 972 (1988).

Error in Dismissal of Detainer: The Montana District Court erred in dismissing a detainer from Colorado after mistakenly determining that the accusatory instrument was itself subject to dismissal in the receiving state, Colorado. *Blakey v. Lack of Speedy Trial Not Prejudicial — Three of Four Ariegwe Factors Balanced in Favor of Defendant Insufficient to Show Prejudicial Delay — Defendant's Motion Fails for Lack of Oppressive Incarceration, No Excessive Anxiety or Concern, and No Apparent Impairment of Defense Under Fourth Factor. St. v. Daly, 2023 MT 142, 413 Mont. 100, 533 P.3d 326.

Defendant in Jail in Another State — Detainer Not Mandatory — Speedy Trial: The defendant took a joyride through a Montana campground with a pickup truck that did not belong to him, damaging both the truck and campground property. On August 12, 2012, Sheridan County officials issued a notice to appear in Justice Court. The defendant was subsequently extradited to jail in Minnesota for a probation violation in that state. The defendant was released from Minnesota prison, appeared in Montana, and received a trial date set for September 12, 2013. The defendant then moved to dismiss the charges, alleging that the state had violated his speedy trial right because the state did not file a detainer while he was incarcerated in Minnesota. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the state was not required to file a detainer and that the delay in trial was attributable to the defendant. St. v. Brekke, 2017 MT 81, 387 Mont. 218, 392 P.3d 570.

Institutional Delays in Trial Not Chargeable Against Requesting State Absent Notice of Request for Speedy Trial: While in federal custody in Texas, Dodson filed a speedy trial request under the Interstate Agreement on Detainers Act (IAD) with officials in Texas after Montana filed a warrant for Dodson's arrest. However, Texas officials failed to forward the speedy trial request, so Dodson moved to dismiss the Montana charges based on Montana's failure to bring him to trial in Montana within 180 days of filing the charges. The dismissal motion was denied and Dodson was ultimately convicted on the Montana charges. Dodson appealed on grounds that the Montana charges should have been dismissed for lack of a speedy trial pursuant to the IAD. The Supreme Court disagreed. The speedy trial clock provisions are not triggered until the prosecutor and court receive the prisoner's request pursuant to the IAD. In cases where delay is occasioned by the custodial state's failure to forward the request, causing harm or detriment to the prisoner, the institutional delays against the custodial state should not be charged against the requesting state that had no notice of the delay or control over the institution causing the delay. St. v. Dodson, 2009 MT 419, 354 M 28, 221 P3d 687 (2009), following Fex v. Mich., 507 US 43 (1993). See also St. v. Seadin, 181 M 294, 593 P2d 451 (1979), and St. v. Wolfe, 250 M 400, 821 P2d 339 (1991).

Speedy Trial — Failure to Petition for Disposal of Charges Properly Considered by District Court in Attributing Delay to Defendant: Stewart was convicted on state theft and forgery charges and appealed his sentence to the Supreme Court, which stayed execution of the state sentence. Conspiracy and mail fraud charges were then filed by the United States, and Stewart was tried, convicted, and incarcerated. After Stewart's state conviction was overturned by the Supreme Court, a warrant was issued for his arrest on other state charges and a detainer was sent to the federal prison. Stewart was informed of his right to request final disposition of the state charges under Article III of the Interstate Agreement on Detainers, but he did not file a petition. Stewart was then released from federal prison and brought to Lincoln County, Montana, to face the state charges. He moved to dismiss the charges for lack of a speedy trial. The District Court denied the motion. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly analyzed Stewart's speedy trial claim under the four-part test set forth in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972). The record shows that 245 days elapsed from the filing of the detainer to Stewart's release to state officials for trial in Montana. Stewart was aware of his right to petition for disposition of the state charges during that time but failed to do so. The Supreme Court held that those days were therefore properly charged to Stewart and were not the fault of the state. The Supreme Court also found that Stewart was not prejudiced by the delay. St. v. Stewart, 266 M 525, 881 P2d 629, 51 St. Rep. 910 (1994).

Running of Speedy Trial Clock Begins Upon Entry Into Term of Imprisonment: After being imprisoned in the Montana State Prison for felony assault (now assault with a weapon), Walker was extradited to Ohio, where he was tried and convicted of aggravated murder. Ohio then placed a detainer on Walker, and he was returned to Montana to complete his term of imprisonment. Walker brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that his trial in Ohio was not conducted in accordance with the speedy trial requirements of the Interstate Agreement on Detainers. The Supreme Court held that the 180-day speedy trial clock imposed by this section began to run when Walker was imprisoned in Montana and not on the date he requested final disposition. The trial was therefore well within the 180-day limit, and the Supreme Court denied the petition. Walker v. McCormick, 260 M 301, 858 P2d 373, 50 St. Rep. 1053 (1993).

Failure to Trigger IAD Speedy Trial Provision: Wolfe argued that he had been denied a speedy trial because the state had failed to try him within 180 days as required by the Interstate Agreement on Detainers (IAD). The Supreme Court held that Wolfe had failed to file with the District Court the papers required by the IAD and therefore had failed to trigger the 180-day provision. St. v. Wolfe, 250 M 400, 821 P2d 339, 48 St. Rep. 1001 (1991).

Speedy Trial — Incarceration in Another State — Delays Attributable to Defendant: Eleven days after his arraignment in Montana for burglary, defendant was arrested in Idaho for burglary and felony theft, convicted, and sentenced to the Idaho State Prison for 5 years. On January 22, 1985, Montana filed a detainer in Idaho. Defendant asserted his right to a speedy trial in Montana by requesting final disposition of the charges against him on June 19, 1985. Defendant requested a delay of his trial on September 3, 1985, and trial was held on October 22, 1985. Defendant appealed his conviction in Montana on the grounds that his right to a speedy trial had been violated and the charges against him should have been dismissed. The Supreme Court found that a total of 196 days of the 393-day delay were attributable to defendant. The presumption that defendant did not receive a speedy trial, which was raised by the 393-day delay between defendant's arrest and his trial, was satisfactorily overcome. Defendant's own conduct prevented the state from bringing him to trial within 180 days. He cannot now complain that he was not given a speedy trial. St. v. Grant, 227 M 181, 738 P2d 106, 44 St. Rep. 994 (1987), followed in St. v. Stewart, 266 M 525, 881 P2d 629, 51 St. Rep. 910 (1994), and St. v. Brekke, 2017 MT 81, 387 Mont. 218, 392 P.3d 570.

Probation Violation Charge: A probation violation charge is not an "untried indictment, information, or complaint" for purposes of Art. III of the compact, and the person charged thus need not be tried within 180 days of his request for a final disposition of the charge. Carchman v. Nash, 87 L Ed 2d 516, 105 S Ct 3401 (1985).

STATEWIDE PUBLIC DEFENDER SYSTEM

Chapter Compiler's Comments

2021 and 2022 Reporting Requirements: Section 2, Ch. 566, L. 2021, provided: "(1) By July 1, 2021, the office of state public defender shall report to the legislative finance committee on what measures it is taking in fiscal years 2022 and 2023 to ensure that its employees are accurately and completely making time entries that demonstrate how much time is:

- (a) dedicated to core tasks;
- (b) spent on specific cases; and
- (c) spent on tasks other than those required to meet the constitutional requirement to provide counsel for individuals not financially able to afford counsel for crimes if jail or prison time may be the punishment if convicted.

(2) By July 1, 2021, the office of state public defender shall report to the legislative finance committee on what it will do in fiscal years 2022 and 2023 to address the concerns identified by the legislative audit division in 2020 regarding billing practices by contractors, including the failure to require the use of assistants for nonattorney tasks, and allowing contractors to work a number of hours each year that may induce attorneys to be contractors instead of the office of state public defender employees.

(3) No later than August 1, 2022, the office of state public defender shall report to the legislative finance committee on the tasks performed by attorneys and nonattorneys in fiscal year 2022 that were not required by statute or constitutional requirement and the amount of time dedicated to that work.

(4) No later than September 1, 2022, the office of state public defender shall report to the legislative finance committee on whether funding from Title IV-E of the Social Security Act provided all funding needed to provide legal representation for children and parents in child abuse and neglect proceedings in fiscal year 2022 and, if not, what necessary expenditures were made from other appropriated funds.

(5) The office of state public defender shall identify data needs for measuring agency performance and establish data-based performance measurements and targets and shall report to the legislative finance committee on these needs and measurements by September 1, 2022.

(6) No later than September 1, 2022, the office of state public defender shall report to the legislative finance committee on the cases in fiscal year 2022 in which it moved for waiver of the assessment and the basis for the motion.

(7) No later than September 1, 2022, the office of state public defender shall report to the legislative finance committee on the time spent by employees and contractors in cases involving defendants in treatment courts in the preceding fiscal year for each defendant. The report must report on each defendant without identifying the defendant by name for each district court or court of limited jurisdiction.

(8) No later than September 1, 2022, the office of state public defender shall report to the legislative finance committee on the time spent by employees and contractors in cases involving defendants in capital cases in fiscal year 2022 for each defendant.”

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 566, L. 2021, provided: “WHEREAS, the Legislature is concerned with the delays associated with transferring defendants to state custody after imposition of sentence. When the Department of Corrections does not timely assume custody of defendants after sentencing, local government facilities may lack capacity to hold other persons. It is the expectation of the Legislature that the Department of Corrections will ensure that defendants sentenced for one or more felonies will not remain in a county detention facility for more than 10 business days after sentencing unless unusual circumstances arise; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Department of Corrections, the Legislature has been advised that the vocational opportunities at the Montana Women’s Prison are inadequate, particularly when compared to the offerings at the Montana State Men’s Prison. The Legislature is mindful that the campuses may face different limitations in what programming may be offered based on location, footprint, and facilities; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Department of Corrections, the Legislature is concerned with the findings of the Legislative Audit Division in 2020 that the Department of Corrections had drug treatment beds that were not fully utilized in fiscal year 2019, which resulted in a payment for failure to allow the contractor to operate at 75% capacity; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Department of Corrections, the Legislature is concerned that the Department of Corrections has yet to fully implement statutory directives to measure the effectiveness of its programs—both those provided by the Department of Corrections employees and those provided by contractors. In 2017, the Legislature directed the Department of Corrections to conduct evaluations of programs to determine their impact on reducing recidivism. This work, in addition to other requirements in Senate Bill No. 59 (2017), appears to be unaddressed or incomplete. Moreover, the Department of Corrections’ definition of recidivism is an inadequate measure for the determination of effectiveness of its programming. The Legislature is interested in having data on crimes committed by those discharged from the Department of Corrections’ custody, not merely “the rate at which adult offenders return to prison in Montana for any reason within three years of their release from prison”, which fails to address reentry outcomes of many individuals committed to the Department of Corrections’ custody and evaluates a truncated time period; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Office of State Public Defender, the Legislature is concerned with the findings of the Legislative Audit Division in 2020 regarding billing practices by contractors, including the failure to require the use of assistants for nonattorney tasks, and allowing contractors to work a number of hours each year that may induce attorneys to be contractors instead of the Office of State Public Defender employees; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Office of State Public Defender, it is the sense of the Legislature that the Office of State Public Defender expends its appropriation, in part, to perform tasks that are not required by the state or federal constitution or by statutory directive, such as in section 47-1-104(4), MCA. Given limited resources and the demands on the Office of State Public Defender staff, the Legislature believes that it is incumbent on the Office of State Public Defender management to limit the scope of its work to what is required by statute and the constitution; and

WHEREAS, with respect to the Office of State Public Defender, neither through its employees nor its contractors should the Office of State Public Defender impair the Legislature’s intent to have defendants share in the costs of counsel provided by the Office of State Public Defender. The Office of State Public Defender employees and contractors should not move the court to waive assessments under section 46-8-113, MCA, unless the defendant can show a compelling reason why they cannot pay this assessment over the course of the sentence; and

WHEREAS, in House Bill No. 640 (2019), the Legislature established a mechanism to ensure that sexual abuse reports generated by those with mandatory reporting responsibilities are provided to county attorneys and that county attorneys report to the Attorney General on the status of the investigations and prosecutions generated from these referrals. It is the sense of the Legislature that the Department of Justice has not undertaken a thorough review of the reports generated pursuant to section 41-3-210(3), MCA, and the Legislature urges the Department of Justice to do so; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has taken a number of steps to strengthen the laws and investigative response to address human trafficking and sexual exploitation of minors. Given the collective commitment in the legislative and executive branches to combat these crimes, the Legislature needs greater clarity on whether its appropriations and statutory changes are having an impact; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature expresses its concern that the backlog of testing on sexual assault kits must be eliminated as soon as possible; and

WHEREAS, the definition of recidivism utilized by the judicial branch in evaluating the effectiveness of treatment courts is different than the definition used by the Department of Corrections for its programming, making it difficult to compare the effectiveness of treatment courts to in-patient treatment. It is the sense of the Legislature that a single definition of recidivism would make it possible to have a consistent evaluation of effectiveness; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature believes that expungement of a conviction for driving under the influence of drugs or alcohol will impair the correctional and public safety goals that the Legislature aims to achieve through the Section D appropriation."

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 386, L. 2015, provided: "WHEREAS, the Office of State Public Defender (OPD) was established in the Montana Public Defender Act by the 2005 Montana Legislature; and

WHEREAS, OPD is supervised by the Montana Public Defender Commission, whose members are appointed by the Governor; and

WHEREAS, the organizational structure of the OPD has changed over time in response to court rulings to include three programs: the Public Defender Program, the Appellate Defender Program, and the Conflict Coordinator, each with its own chief; and

WHEREAS, the number of cases assigned to the Public Defender Program has grown by 14.6% since fiscal year 2010, and, despite a yearly case closing rate of 91.8% during fiscal year 2014, the Public Defender Program had nearly 21,000 open, active cases at the end of that fiscal year; and

WHEREAS, the Appellate Defender Program experienced a 42% increase in caseload from fiscal year 2012 to 2014; and

WHEREAS, abuse and neglect cases made up 34% of the case growth in the Public Defender Program from fiscal year 2010 to fiscal year 2014, and in the Appellate Defender Program these cases were projected to increase 43% between fiscal year 2013 and fiscal year 2015; and

WHEREAS, in February 2013 the Commission unanimously approved a resolution to authorize the Chief Public Defender to take necessary and appropriate actions to limit acceptance of new cases until further resources were available or caseloads decreased to a manageable number."

Task Force on State Public Defender Operations: Sections 1 and 2, Ch. 386, L. 2015, established a task force on state public defender operations to study the operations of the office of state public defender, develop a long-term organizational plan allowing the office to provide effective assistance of counsel, report to the governor, chief justice of the supreme court, and the 65th legislature, and prepare draft legislation, if appropriate. Sections 1 and 2 were effective May 4, 2015, and terminate December 31, 2016.

Implementation: Section 68, Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: "(1) The governor shall appoint the members of the public defender commission established pursuant to [section 5] [2-15-1028, now repealed] no later than July 1, 2005.

(2) The department of administration shall provide staff support to the commission beginning July 1, 2005, and continuing until the commission hires a chief public defender and until the chief public defender hires necessary staff for the commission and the office of state public defender.

(3) By December 31, 2005, the commission shall hire a chief public defender and issue any requests for proposals for consulting services and technical assistance that may be needed to help establish the office of state public defender provided in [section 7] [47-1-201].

(4) Standards and procedures required to implement the provisions of [sections 1 through 4 and 6 through 14] [Title 47, ch. 1] must be established, and the office of state public defender must be opened by no later than July 1, 2006.

(5) During fiscal year 2006, a commission member is entitled to $50 for each day that the member spends conducting the official business of the commission.

(6) The department of administration shall assist the commission in developing a public defender information technology system that utilizes existing resources as much as possible and that interfaces with state executive branch, judicial branch, and local computer systems to the extent necessary and practicable to ensure that data required to effectively manage public defender caseloads and track costs can be efficiently collected and analyzed.”

Transition — Transfer of County and City Employees to State Employment — Rights: Section 69, Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: “(1) Employees of county or city public defender offices who are employed by a county or city on June 30, 2006, may be transferred to state employment in the office of state public defender provided for in [section 7] [47-1-201]. Transferred employees become state employees on July 1, 2006.

(2) All transferred employees become subject to the state classification plan on July 1, 2006, except those specifically exempted under [section 7(2) and (3)(a)] [47-1-201(2) and (3)(a)].

(3) The salary of transferred county or city employees on July 1, 2006, must be the same as it was on July 1, 2005, plus any salary increases provided for by the county or city not exceeding 4%.

(4) An employee’s compensation may not be reduced as the result of the transfer to the state classification plan.

(5) This section does not preserve the right of any former county or city employee to any salary or compensation, including longevity benefits, that was not accrued and payable as of June 30, 2006.

(6) A transferred employee may elect to become a member of the state employee benefit plan beginning July 1, 2006, or remain on the employee’s county or city benefit plan through the remainder of the plan year in effect on June 30, 2006. For an employee who elects to remain on a county or city benefit plan, the monthly state contribution toward insurance benefits must be transferred to the county or city benefit plan. Any benefit costs in excess of the state contribution must be paid by the employee.

(7) Accumulated sick and vacation leave and years of service with a county or city must be transferred fully to the state and become an obligation of the state on July 1, 2006. On January 1, 2007, and on January 1, 2008, the counties and cities with office of public defender employees who are transferred to state employment by this section shall pay the state 12.5% of the sick leave accrual and 50% of vacation leave accrual for each employee who is transferred to state employment. The transferred employees shall retain their accumulated sick and vacation leave. Any liability for accumulated compensatory time of employees who are transferred from county or city employment to state employment under this section is not transferred to the state and remains an obligation of the county or city that employed the employee prior to the transfer, subject to federal law and the county’s or city’s personnel policies.

(8) A transferred employee who is not already covered by the public employees’ retirement system provided in Title 19, chapter 3, becomes a new member of the public employees’ retirement system on July 1, 2006, and is subject to the provisions of Title 19, chapter 3.

(9) A collective bargaining agreement in effect on July 1, 2006, may not be construed as binding on the state. However, transferred employees are entitled to organize and collectively bargain pursuant to Title 39, chapter 31.”

Transition of Appellate Defender Commission and Office: Section 70, Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: “(1) The terms of members of the appellate defender commission established in 2-15-1020 terminate on June 30, 2006, when that section is repealed.

(2) Commission staff in the office of appellate defender established pursuant to the Appellate Defender Act in 46-8-210 through 46-8-213 [all now repealed] must be officially transferred to the office of state public defender established pursuant to [section 7] [47-1-201]. The transfer is effective July 1, 2006, at which time the position of chief appellate defender becomes exempt from the classification and pay plan pursuant to 2-18-103 and [section 7(3)(a)(ii)] [47-1-201(3)(a)(ii)]. The compensation and benefits of the chief appellate defender and other staff of the office of appellate defender may not be reduced as a result of this transfer and the chief appellate defender and other staff of the office of appellate defender remain entitled to all compensation, rights, and benefits accrued as of June 30, 2006.

(3) The appellate defender commission and the public defender commission shall work together to provide that the duties and responsibilities of the appellate defender commission and the caseload of the staff of the office of appellate defender are transferred to the public defender commission and office of state public defender in a manner that ensures continuity of services. On July 1, 2006, all work of the appellate defender commission must officially be transferred to the supervision of the public defender commission and the chief public defender.

(4) Subject to the provisions of [section 5] [2-15-1028, now repealed], a member of the appellate defender commission may be appointed by the governor to simultaneously serve on the public defender commission and the appellate defender commission until the appellate defender commission terminates pursuant to this section. A member serving on both commissions simultaneously is entitled to the compensation provided for the public defender commission in [section 68(5)] [not codified] when engaged in the official duties of the public defender commission, provided that expenses paid pursuant to 2-18-501 through 2-18-503 may not be paid twice for the same period of time."

Rights to Property: Section 71, Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: "(1) Subject to subsection (2), office equipment, computer equipment, furniture, and fixtures that are owned by a county or city and used by employees of a public defender office on June 30, 2006, remain the property of the county or city unless otherwise agreed upon by the county or city and the state.

(2) (a) An employee of a county or city public defender office who becomes a state employee under [section 69] retains the right to use all property relating to the functions of the office and being used by the employee on June 30, 2006. The property includes records, office equipment, computer equipment, supplies, contracts, books, papers, documents, maps, grant and earmarked account balances, vehicles, and all other similar property. However, the employee may not use or divert money in a fund or account for a purpose other than as provided by law.

(b) Whenever the state replaces office equipment, computer equipment, furniture, or fixtures used as provided in subsection (2)(a) and still owned by a county or city, the right to use the replaced property reverts to the county or city.

(3) This section does not apply to property owned by the federal government."

Implementation — Determination of Actual Costs — Legislative Audit — Report: Section 72, Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: "(1) The legislature's intent is to provide that:

(a) funding responsibilities for public defender services pursuant to [sections 1 through 4 and 6 through 14] [Title 47, ch. 1] will be shared by state and local government; and

(b) the counties, consolidated governments, and cities will pay their share of costs through a reduction in the county's, consolidated government's, or city's base entitlement share under 15-1-121.

(2) To fulfill the intent of subsection (1) for Cascade County, Gallatin County, Lewis and Clark County, Missoula County, Flathead County, and Yellowstone County, an audit, by or at the direction of the legislative auditor, must be conducted on all actual costs for public defender services in district court and justice's court proceedings incurred from July 1, 1998, through June 30, 2004, for which records exist. The audit must separate the costs by expenditure category and distinguish between costs paid by a county and costs paid or reimbursed by the state.

(3) Each county audited under subsection (2) shall reimburse the legislative auditor for 50% of the cost of the audit for that county.

(4) By April 30, 2006, the results of the audit must be reported to the governor's budget office, the legislative audit committee, the legislative finance committee, and the law and justice interim committee.

(5) The law and justice interim committee shall prepare legislation to be introduced in the 2007 legislative session that will amend 15-1-121 to provide that the base entitlement share for Cascade County, Gallatin County, Lewis and Clark County, Missoula County, Flathead County, and Yellowstone County is adjusted by an appropriate amount arrived at based on the audit and in consultation with the legislative finance committee, the legislative audit committee, representatives of the counties, the governor's office, the American civil liberties union, the attorney general's office, and all other interested and participating parties.

(6) (a) For the fiscal year beginning July 1, 2011, and every 5 years thereafter, the legislative fiscal analyst shall compare the percentage change in general fund revenue for the previous 5 years to the percentage change in the amounts allocated to local governments under the provisions of 15-1-121, as amended in 2005, and the actual costs for public defender services in [this act] for the same time period.

(b) The results of the comparison must be presented to the governor, legislative finance committee, law and justice interim committee, and supreme court by September 1 of the following fiscal year.

(7) As used in this section:

(a) "actual costs" means all expenditures by a county for public defender services in justice court and all expenditures by a county for public defender services in district court that were not reimbursed by the office of court administrator pursuant to 3-5-901; and

(b) "public defender services" means all services and support associated with providing defendants in district court or justice court proceedings with assigned, appointed, or contracted attorneys, including:

(i) compensation;

- (ii) personal expenses, including travel, meals, and lodging;
- (iii) office operating costs, including rent, utilities, supplies, postage, copying, computer systems, and other office operating costs;
- (iv) professional and paraprofessional support services, including services provided by investigators, paralegals, researchers, and secretaries;
- (v) services required to support a defense, including transcripts, witnesses, and other support;
- (vi) professional support, including professional education and training;
- (vii) costs of psychiatric evaluations under 46-14-202 and 46-14-221, including the cost of examinations and other associated expenses; and
- (viii) other services or support provided by the county to provide assigned, appointed, or contracted defense counsel in justice court and district court proceedings.”

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Effective Date: Section 80(1), Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: “Except as provided in subsection (2), [this act] is effective on passage and approval.” Approved April 28, 2005.

2017 Amendment: Chapter 358 in introductory clause after “chapter” inserted “unless the context clearly requires otherwise”; inserted definition of director; deleted definition that read: “‘Commission’ means the public defender commission established in 2-15-1028”; in definition of office substituted “2-15-1029” for “47-1-201”; in definition of public defender at end substituted “appellate defender division and the conflict defender division” for “office of appellate defender”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2017.

Severability: Section 48, Ch. 358, L. 2017, was a severability clause.

2011 Amendment: Chapter 24 in definition of public defender at end inserted reference to appellate defender attorneys; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2011.

Case Notes

No Legal Duty to Provide Services to Indigent Defendant Who Has Hired a Private Attorney: An indigent defendant was represented at trial by a public defender but, using funds provided by friends, hired a private attorney to appeal his conviction. The defendant’s private attorney requested in a mandamus proceeding that the Office of the Appellate Defender (OAD) be directed to provide services to the defendant. The Supreme Court held that under 47-1-111 and 47-1-201, the OAD had no legal duty to continue to provide services to an indigent defendant once the defendant was represented by a private attorney. Office of the Appellate Defender v. Engel, 2010 MT 168, 357 Mont. 182, 236 P.3d 609.

2023 Amendment — Coordination: See 2023 Session Law for amendment made by sec. 53, Ch. 716, L. 2023. Amendment effective July 1, 2023, and terminates June 30, 2025.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 1, Ch. 25, L. 2023, and sec. 49, Ch. 716, L. 2023, were replaced by sec. 53, Ch. 716, L. 2023, a coordination section.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 716, L. 2023, provided: "WHEREAS, there is, at the present time, a court case before the United States Supreme Court known as Haaland v. Brackeen, No. 21-376, that has the potential to overturn or modify the Indian Child Welfare Act in its current form, and the Legislature seeks to provide guidance for Indian child protection cases in the interim as this case is decided. The Legislature does not expect this to be the final word on how we deal with Indian child welfare issues or how we seek to provide for all of Montana's children within the child protection system."

2017 Amendment: Chapter 358 throughout section in four places substituted "director" for "commission"; in (1) at end deleted "and administered by the office"; in (3) in first sentence after "orders the" substituted "assignment of a public defender" for "office or the office of appellate defender to assign counsel"; and in (4) in introductory clause after "order" substituted "assignment of a public defender" for "an office to assign counsel". Amendment effective July 1, 2017.

Severability: Section 48, Ch. 358, L. 2017, was a severability clause.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 307 in (4)(b)(iv) after "parental" substituted "consent" for "notification" and substituted "Parental Consent for Abortion Act of 2013, as provided in 50-20-509" for "Parental Notice of Abortion Act, as provided in 50-20-232". Amendment effective July 1, 2013.

Severability: Section 16, Ch. 307, L. 2013, was a severability clause.

2012 Amendment by Referendum: Referendum No. 120, proposed by Ch. 307, L. 2011, and approved at the general election held November 6, 2012, in (3) and (4) at beginning deleted "Beginning July 1, 2006"; in (4)(b)(iv) substituted "50-20-232" for "50-20-212"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective January 1, 2013.

2011 Amendment: Chapter 24 in (3) at beginning deleted "Beginning July 1, 2006", inserted "or the office of appellate defender", and after "counsel, the" inserted "appropriate"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2011.

Case Notes

Order Requiring Public Defender Overturned — Supervisory Control — Nonjailable Offenses: The Justice Court ordered the Office of State Public Defender (OPD) to appoint a public defender to represent a defendant in a misdemeanor theft case. The OPD appealed on a writ of supervisory control, arguing that the Justice Court had no authority to compel it to provide a public defender in a case involving a nonjailable misdemeanor offense, pursuant to 46-8-101. In response, the Justice Court argued that the defendant had a right to government-provided counsel under the federal and state constitutions in all cases. The Supreme Court overruled the Justice Court, holding that supervisory control was necessary and proper, 46-8-101 did not require a public defender in the underlying case because it did not involve a jailable offense, and there was no authority suggesting that this statutory restriction of public defenders to felonies and misdemeanors involving jailable offenses was unconstitutional. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. Fagenstrom, 2019 MT 104, 395 Mont. 397, 439 P.3d 1285.

Delay Appointing Counsel — Plain Error Review Declined: On appeal, the defendant argued that (1) the Office of the State Public Defender's failure to appoint counsel for 5 weeks violated his constitutional and statutory rights, and (2) the period during which he would have been able to substitute the District Court judge was a critical stage in the proceedings, both of which required that his conviction be reversed. However, the Supreme Court found that the defendant did have a public defender for his initial court appearances and that after he was arraigned he received a specific assigned counsel within 3 weeks. The Supreme Court declined to find that the 10-day window during which a judge may be substituted is a critical stage of the proceedings, and the defendant never indicated that he wanted to substitute the judge. The failure to assign counsel sooner did not give rise to a manifest miscarriage of justice, and the Supreme Court declined to exercise plain error review. St. v. Zlahn, 2014 MT 224, 376 Mont. 245, 332 P.3d 247.

Public Defender Not to Be Appointed for Postconviction Relief Except in Compliance With Statutory Timeline: The District Court ordered that a public defender be appointed since the interests of justice required it, even though a response by the state to a petition for postconviction relief had not been filed. The Supreme Court granted a writ of supervisory control and held on the merits that because there was a chance that a public defender might be appointed in cases in which the District Court would hold that the court-ordered response showed the petitioner was not entitled to relief under any circumstances, thus wasting the resources of the Office of State Public Defender, a public defender may be appointed by a District Court in a postconviction proceeding only after the court has received and reviewed the court-ordered response to the petition in compliance with 46-21-201. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. 18th Judicial District Court, 2011 MT 97, 360 Mont. 284, 255 P.3d 107.

Showing of Good Cause Required Prior to Appointment of State Public Defender in Habeas Corpus Proceedings: More than a simple motion is required before the Supreme Court will appoint the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD) to represent a person seeking habeas corpus relief. In such case, OSPD counsel will be appointed only upon a demonstration of good cause. A showing of likelihood of the illegality of the sentence of the person seeking relief, and that the sentence will be shortened or terminated if habeas corpus relief is granted, is required before OSPD counsel will be appointed. A statement that an applicant is untrained or unskilled in the law is insufficient, without more, to establish good cause. Dyer v. Mahoney, 2008 MT 117, 342 M 495, 182 P3d 737 (2008).

Appointment of Public Defender Prior to Filing of Petition for Postconviction Relief Prohibited: Section 46-8-104 provides that a District Court may order that counsel from the Office of State Public Defender represent an eligible person who has filed a postconviction action or proceeding under certain circumstances, but nothing in that section allows appointment of a public defender in advance of the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. Further, this section does not give a District Court authority to appoint counsel employed by the public defender system to represent a person who may desire to file a petition for postconviction relief but who has not done so. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. District Court, 2007 MT 333, 340 M 234, 178 P3d 693 (2007).

2023 Amendment: See 2023 Session Law for amendment made by sec. 1, Ch. 207, L. 2023. Amendment effective October 1, 2023.

2019 Amendment: Chapter 61 in (1)(a), (1)(b), and (1)(c) substituted "hire" for "appoint"; inserted (1)(d) adding responsibilities to the list of duties of the director; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2019.

2017 Amendment: Chapter 358 in (1) substituted current text concerning director's appointment of public defender division, appellate defender division, and conflict defender division administrators for former text that read: "The commission shall supervise and direct the system. In addition to other duties assigned pursuant to this chapter, the commission shall:

(1) (a) establish the qualifications, duties, and compensation of the chief public defender, as provided in 47-1-201, appoint a chief public defender after considering qualified applicants, and regularly evaluate the performance of the chief public defender; and

(b) establish the qualifications, duties, and compensation of the chief appellate defender, as provided in 47-1-205, appoint a chief appellate defender after considering qualified applicants, and regularly evaluate the performance of the chief appellate defender"; in (2) at beginning inserted

"The director shall"; in (3) at beginning inserted "The director shall also"; in (3)(a) substituted "based on proposals submitted by the public defender division administrator, the central services division administrator, the appellate defender division administrator, and the conflict defender division administrator" for "proposals submitted by the chief public defender, the administrative director, and the chief appellate defender"; inserted (3)(e) concerning examination of workloads and inclusion of findings in report; in (4) at beginning inserted "The office of state public defender shall"; deleted former (5) that read: "(5) establish and oversee a conflicts office with a conflicts manager responsible for conflicts of interest and for ensuring that cases involving a conflict of interest are handled according to professional ethical standards"; deleted former (9) that read: "(9) submit a biennial report to the governor, the supreme court, and the legislature, as provided in 5-11-210. Each interim, the commission shall also specifically report to the law and justice interim committee established pursuant to 5-5-202 and 5-5-226. The report must cover the preceding biennium and include:

- (a) all policies or procedures in effect for the operation and administration of the statewide public defender system;
- (b) all standards established or being considered by the commission, the chief public defender, or the chief appellate defender;
- (c) the number of deputy public defenders and the region supervised by each;
- (d) the number of public defenders employed or contracted with in the system, identified by region;
- (e) the number of attorney and nonattorney staff supervised by each deputy public defender;
- (f) the number of new cases in which counsel was assigned to represent a party, identified by region, court, and case type;
- (g) the total number of persons represented by the office and the office of appellate defender, identified by region, court, and case type;
- (h) the annual caseload and workload of each public defender, except for the chief public defender, and of the office of appellate defender, identified by region, court, and case type;
- (i) the training programs conducted by the office and the number of attorney and nonattorney staff who attended each program;
- (j) the continuing education courses on criminal defense or criminal procedure attended by each public defender employed or contracted with in the system; and
- (k) detailed expenditure data by court and case type"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2017.

Code Commissioner Correction: In (3)(e) the code commissioner changed the reference to [section 28], which amended 47-1-201, to [section 27], which enacted 47-1-125, to correct an erroneous reference.

Severability: Section 48, Ch. 358, L. 2017, was a severability clause.

2011 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 24 inserted (1)(b) related to chief appellate defender; in (2)(a) inserted "including cases on appeal"; in (3) and (9)(b) inserted reference to chief appellate defender; in (9)(g) and (9)(h) inserted reference to office of appellate defender; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2011.

Chapter 344 inserted (5) relating to conflicts of interest; deleted former (5) that read: "(5) establish policies and procedures for identifying cases in which public defenders may have a conflict of interest and for ensuring that cases involving a conflict of interest are handled according to professional ethical standards"; in (9)(h) inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Case Notes

No Legal Duty to Provide Services to Indigent Defendant Who Has Hired a Private Attorney: An indigent defendant was represented at trial by a public defender but, using funds provided by friends, hired a private attorney to appeal his conviction. The defendant's private attorney requested in a mandamus proceeding that the Office of the Appellate Defender (OAD) be directed to provide services to the defendant. The Supreme Court held that under 47-1-111 and 47-1-201, the OAD had no legal duty to continue to provide services to an indigent defendant once the defendant was represented by a private attorney. Office of the Appellate Defender v. Engel, 2010 MT 168, 357 Mont. 182, 236 P.3d 609.

No Mistake of Law in City Court's Failure to Appoint Counsel Given Defendant's Prior Refusal of Appointed Counsel or Appropriate Request: Compton was arrested in Flathead County and charged with first offense DUI. At both Compton's initial appearance in City Court and at the subsequent arraignment hearing, Compton refused appointed counsel. However, a few days later, Compton submitted a whimsical, handwritten document to the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD) in Whitefish requesting appointment of counsel. The OSPD then appeared in court and requested permission to file a notice of appearance on behalf of Compton, but the judge refused to enter the OSPD's appearance because of the absence of documents demonstrating an attorney-client relationship. The OSPD then faxed the handwritten document to the court, but the judge declined to appoint counsel absent a request from Compton, either in person or by an appropriate written request. The OSPD then filed a petition for supervisory control with the Supreme Court requesting that the court order the City Judge to appoint the OSPD to represent counsel. The Supreme Court noted that a writ of supervisory control is appropriate only in extraordinary circumstances when a court is proceeding under a mistake of law that will result in significant injustice if not corrected. Here, the OSPD was unable to demonstrate a mistake of law. Under 47-1-111, it is assumed that a court's initial order for appointment of counsel will follow an appropriate request by a defendant. Compton had twice refused appointed counsel, and the handwritten request lacked credibility and was inappropriate, so refusal to appoint counsel absent a request from Compton, either in person or by an appropriate written request, was not a mistake of law. The Supreme Court denied the petition for supervisory control, noting that if Compton desired appointed counsel, he could submit an appropriate request and that his eligibility could then be determined in accordance with statute. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. Whitefish City Court, 2008 MT 79, 342 M 141, 188 P3d 43 (2008), distinguishing Rios v. Justice's Court, 2006 MT 256, 334 M 111, 148 P3d 602 (2006).

Conditions for Appointment of Appellate Counsel: The Supreme Court found 46-8-104 to be vague, confusing, lacking in legislative guidance, and either overbroad or underinclusive with regard to appointment of counsel for defendants. The court determined that it will appoint counsel when a defendant's, petitioner's, or appellant's motion or petition demonstrates that: (1) a statute specifically mandates appointment of counsel; (2) the defendant, petitioner, or appellant is clearly entitled to counsel under the U.S. or Montana Constitution; or (3) extraordinary circumstances exist that require appointment of counsel to prevent a miscarriage of justice. The motion or petition must reference specific facts and documents in the record and cite specific jurisprudential, statutory, or constitutional authority to demonstrate the existence of a condition warranting appointment of counsel. (Note: The 2007 Legislature revised 46-8-104 to provide guidance as suggested in Dillard.) Dillard v. St., 2006 MT 328, 335 M 87, 153 P3d 575 (2006).

When Review of Indigency to Take Place: Any review of a defendant's eligibility for public defender services takes place after the state public defender's office has conducted a determination of the defendant's eligibility for public defender services. The court's review of the office's determination takes place only when one of the parties seeks review. However, nothing in this section contemplates the court initiating the review process based on its own doubts about a defendant's eligibility or authorizes a procedure designed to place the court in a gatekeeper role by asserting primary authority over indigency determinations. Rios v. Justice's Court, 2006 MT 256, 334 M 111, 148 P3d 602 (2006).

Case Notes

State-Mandated Reduction in Compensation for Contract Attorneys — Memorandum of Understanding — No Violation of Contract Clause — Budget Cut Reductions Permissible: The petitioners were attorneys who contracted with the office of state public defender (OPD) to provide legal services for indigent clients. To become an OPD contract attorney, the petitioners signed a contract, referred to as a memorandum of understanding (MOU), with OPD. In March 2018, OPD announced a reduction to the hourly contract rate and a reduction of pay for case-related travel time in order to implement budget cuts effective for any services rendered on or after April 1, 2018. The petitioners pursued a class action lawsuit in District Court against the state, seeking declaratory relief, injunctive relief, and damages for breach of contract and violation of the contract clause in Art. II, sec. 31, Mont. Const. The state, in turn, filed a motion for summary judgment based on legal interpretation of the MOU under contract law. The District Court granted the state's motion and the Supreme Court affirmed, reasoning that nothing in the MOU indicated that the compensation rates were locked in place for the duration of the petitioners' representation. Additionally, the MOU's language clearly provided for prospective modification of compensation rates at the state's discretion, which was limited by both 47-1-121 and the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. *Brooke v. (i) an administrative director, who must be experienced in business management and contract management;

(ii) a chief contract manager to oversee and enforce the contracting program;

(iii) a training coordinator, appointed as provided in 47-1-210;

(iv) deputy public defenders, as provided in 47-1-215; in (3)(c) substituted "public defender division" for "office"; deleted former (5) through (10) (see 2017 Session Law for former text); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2017.

Severability: Section 48, Ch. 358, L. 2017, was a severability clause.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 120 in (10)(a) and (10)(b) in first sentence substituted “legislative fiscal analyst” for “legislative finance committee”; in (10)(a) in second sentence inserted “be provided in an electronic format and”; and in (10)(b) inserted last sentence requiring report to be provided in electronic format. Amendment effective July 1, 2013.

2011 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 24 in (3) after “office” inserted “of state public defender”; deleted former (3)(a)(ii) that read: “(ii) a chief appellate defender”; inserted (8) related to assistance with certain functions of office of appellate defender; in (9) at end inserted reference to defense expenses of office of appellate defender; in (10)(a) in first sentence inserted “by September 30 of the subsequent fiscal year” and deleted former third sentence that read: “The report for fiscal year 2009 must be provided to the legislative finance committee by January 1, 2010, and the report for fiscal year 2010 must be provided to the legislative finance committee by September 30, 2010”; in (10)(b) in first sentence near beginning inserted “by September 30 of the subsequent fiscal year” and deleted former second sentence that read: “The report for fiscal year 2009 must be provided to the legislative finance committee by January 1, 2010, and the report for fiscal year 2010 must be provided to the legislative finance committee by September 30, 2010”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2011.

Chapter 394 in (10)(a) and (10)(b) inserted “by September 30 of the subsequent fiscal year” and deleted former last sentences that read: “The report for fiscal year 2009 must be provided to the legislative finance committee by January 1, 2010, and the report for fiscal year 2010 must be provided to the legislative finance committee by September 30, 2010”; and in (10)(a) in second sentence substituted “unduplicated count data for all cases for which representation is paid for by the office of public defender” for “data for both employee and contract attorneys”. Amendment effective July 1, 2011.

Severability: Section 6, Ch. 394, L. 2011, was a severability clause.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 486 in (5) at beginning of introductory clause deleted “Beginning July 1, 2006”; inserted (9) regarding reporting requirements of the office of public defender; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2009.

Court Ordering Interpreter Fees — Statutory Authority Exceeded — Oral Pronouncement Different From Written Order: The defendant, who spoke English as a second language, pleaded no contest to possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute, reserving his right to appeal. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court ordered the defendant to pay the costs of his interpreter. However, the District Court’s written sentencing order also required a 10% administrative fee. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, finding that the Office of the State Public Defender is responsible for interpreter expenses and that the oral pronouncement of sentence controls when in conflict with a written order. *St. v. No Legal Duty to Provide Services to Indigent Defendant Who Has Hired a Private Attorney: An indigent defendant was represented at trial by a public defender but, using funds provided by friends, hired a private attorney to appeal his conviction. The defendant’s private attorney requested in a mandamus proceeding that the Office of the Appellate Defender (OAD) be directed to provide services to the defendant. The Supreme Court held that under 47-1-111 and 47-1-201, the OAD had no legal duty to continue to provide services to an indigent defendant once the defendant was represented by a private attorney. Office of the Appellate Defender v. Engel, 2010 MT 168, 357 Mont. 182, 236 P.3d 609.

Applicable Statutory Scheme for Providing Interpreter for Deaf Person in Criminal Proceeding — Payment of Interpreter’s Fees: Alkire was arrested and charged in Municipal Court for criminal trespass to vehicles and was assigned representation by the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD). Because Alkire was hearing impaired, he requested and was granted a team of interpreters. A question then arose regarding whether the OSPD or the county was responsible for costs associated with the appointment of the team of interpreters. The court determined that, pursuant to 47-1-201, the OSPD was responsible for the costs. Alkire contended that 49-4-503 provided that the court was required to bear the costs. On a writ of supervisory control, the Supreme Court considered two possible statutory schemes for determining the entity responsible for the costs. Scheme no. 1 provides interpreters for the deaf in official proceedings pursuant to Title 49, ch. 4, part 5, and 49-4-509 requires the court to pay, from the county general fund, reasonable compensation for services plus travel and transportation expenses for an interpreter who is appointed in a criminal proceeding. Scheme no. 2 arises from a combination of Title 26, ch. 2, part 5, 46-15-116, and 47-1-201, and requires payment by the OSPD for witness and interpreter fees, including interpreter fees in a criminal proceeding. The Supreme Court concluded that scheme no. 1 was more specific because it pertained to providing an interpreter for a deaf person in a criminal proceeding, while scheme no. 2 was more general and pertained to the appointment of interpreters and translators generally and who are treated as witnesses. In this case, the more specific statutory scheme no. 1 for an interpreter for Alkire in the criminal proceeding prevailed over the general provisions of scheme no. 2, so the trial court erred in requiring that the OSPD bear the costs of the interpreters. Thus, the writ of supervisory control was granted, and the case was remanded to Municipal Court for further proceedings directing that the costs of the interpreters be paid from the county fund. Alkire v. Missoula Municipal Court, 2008 MT 223, 344 M 260, 186 P3d 1288 (2008).

Attorney General's Opinions

Discretion of Public Defender Commission and Office of State Public Defender to Retain City and County Defender Employees: Senate Bill No. 146 (Ch. 449, L. 2005), which created a new state public defender system, contained a transition section that allowed but did not require the Public Defender Commission and the Office of State Public Defender to hire current city and county public defender employees. Thus, it was within the discretion of the Commission and the Office whether to retain current city and county public defender employees for the new public defender system. 51 A.G. Op. 10 (2005).

Case Notes

No Deprivation of Right to Counsel — Failure to Cooperate With Multiple Public Defenders — Order Granting Motion to Withdraw Not Required: After firing multiple public defenders, the defendant represented herself at trial and was convicted in Municipal Court of a handful of misdemeanors. On first appeal, the District Court determined that the Municipal Court made the appropriate balancing decision between the defendant's right to counsel and her refusal to work with everyone appointed to represent her. On final appeal, the Supreme Court held that it was within the Municipal Court's discretion to accept the defendant's decision to represent herself, and to the extent that the defendant did not expressly and unequivocally waive her right to counsel because her decision was inconsistent over time, she effectively did so by failing to cooperate with a series of court-appointed attorneys. Any procedural errors that may have occurred based on the Municipal Court's failure to act on an attorney's pending motion to withdraw did not deprive the defendant of her rights, as she informed the court that she desired to represent herself. Additionally, the Municipal Court took into consideration that the defendant had represented herself in a criminal proceeding in the past and that she was aware of the charges and possible penalties. Missoula v. Fogarty, 2013 MT 254, 371 Mont. 513, 309 P.3d 10.
